PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also one who is accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not blinded by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROWWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

— ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

— (Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. Tail, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

DR. REIGNIER ON ANIMAL MAGNETISM.

The following is a summary of two lectures delivered before the Union Magnétique, Paris, reported in the Revue Spirite of May:—

The history of what we now recognise as animal magnetism goes far back into the past. It was the basis of the knowledge of the initiated in the temples of ancient Egypt, and the source of the power of magi, sybils, pythonesses, oracles, and prophets.

In Europe, at the commencement of the fifteenth century, Paracelsus, of Switzerland, collected the occult phenomena known up to his day, and upon them constructed a doctrine. He taught that many of the phenomena presenting themselves in so-called magical cures, were analogous to those caused by the loadstone (magnes) and he substituted the term human magnetical for magical. He had many disciples.

At the close of the same century Van Helmont, a physician of Holland, performed so many cures by animal magnetism that people called him a magician. Helenianus and other physicians followed him with success.

Towards the close of the eighteenth century Mesmer appeared. His propositions embraced all that was then known of the subject. He treated diseases magnetically, but in his practice he made use of adventitious processes tinged with charlatanry; this deterred many from following him. After him, as at present, the practice was followed without any adventitious process.

In 1825, Rostan, professor at the Faculté de Médecine, Paris, acknowledged, in the "Dictionnaire des Sciences Médicales," the facts of the subject, but disputed Mesmer's doctrine of the transmission of a fluide, or force. The equally eminent Dr. Bertram followed him in agreement as to the facts, but contended that a fluide did pass from operator to patient.

It is well-known that the loadstone (magnes) is a native oxide of iron possessing the property of attracting iron, and that this characteristic property can be communicated from it to bars or needles of iron and steel, which, if then suspended at their axis, point north and south, indicating what is called the magnetic meridian. The loadstone was used in the past as a medicine in nervous disorders; even down to the present century it had advocates among physicians of European note. In the modern system of Metallotherapy is included the application of magnetised needles worked into sheets with fine steel wire, and it is a successful treatment in many cases in which the late Dr. Burq, its proposer, employed it.

The phenomena of animal magnetism are of two kinds—physical and psychical; in the former we have induced catalepsy, trance, &c., presenting symptoms of natural maladies, and which induced states the operator can cause to disappear rapidly without leaving the least trace. Such cases should form an important chapter in physiology. Now, from induced symptoms of a disease to the disease itself there is but a step; if we can cause symptoms to disappear rapidly, why should we not cause the natural disease itself to disappear by employing the same means with persistency? Here is the secret of curative magnetism, in the changing—by passes or imposition of hands with firm will—the character of the innervation of organs in an abnormal state, and aiding the vis medicatrix nature—the natural healing power—to restore it to the normal.

With respect to the psychical phenomena, let me ask, First, what explanation can be given of the fact of a subject of poor intelligence and no education going—after a few magnetic passes—into a state in which he describes the organs, and their condition, of a patient, in such a manner that none but an anatomist can follow? Secondly, what explanation can be given of the fact of a similarly magnetised subject mentally visiting remote parts of which he never can have had any knowledge? or the persons and contents of houses, never visited by him in the body, and exactly and minutely describing them?

In such facts who does not see proofs of the soul's existence? and that it can for a time leave the body to which it is united, travel, and perceive according to the magnetiser's will? To me it seems that some of these facts show that the soul had a previous existence, and had then acquired knowledge which it exhibits when thus liberated. These psychical facts indicate that the soul can cognise independently of the brain—its earthly medium or instrument.

The psychical facts of animal magnetism bring it into the domain of psychology, the science which has reference to the intellectual faculties, their various manifestations, and their cause—the human soul: that immortal entity in us which elevates us and enables us to conceive of a First Cause of all causes—God!

DREAMS.—"J.P.W." writes that his wife, on waking one morning, said that she had been dreaming that her sister, in the country, was in bed with her face fiery red. By post the same evening we were informed that that sister was taken ill with scarlet fever. Her mother once told her that she had had a dream of hearing steps of men on the stairs, and that, on opening the door, she saw a coffin being carried down, and on the plate she saw her own name and "Aged 48." She was then in ordinary health and her age forty-six. She died two years afterwards.

TRANCE.—A daughter of J. Benner, of Marion, Penn., was seized with spasms and apparently died. At the expiration of two days feeble respiration was observed; she continued to breathe, but without consciousness, for twenty-six days, no food passing her lips; she then opened her eyes and asked for water. From that time she gradually returned to her usual diet, and has gained strength to get about.—Benj. Ranck, a farmer, of Fayette, Ill., fell into a trance while ill, and remained in it for several hours. On recovering, he said that he had been talking with departed friends, who told him that he would be with them next day at a certain hour. He set his affairs in order and died exactly at the time he mentioned.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

MR. THOMAS PALLISTER BARKAS, F.G.S.

[The following interesting sketch of Mr. T. P. Barkas has recently appeared in the Newcastle Examiner.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

In Newcastle, and a wide district of country round about it, there is perhaps no man better known than the gentleman whose name is at the head of this sketch, and he is equally well known, through his lectures and writings, to students of spiritual phenomena all the world over. Laugh as we may at séances, materialised spirit-forms, and men and women supernaturally inspired, modern Psychology has its numerous disciples, many of whom are men of culture and position, and an abounding literature; and in the North of England Mr. Barkas is its recognised head. We are not concerned here with the truth or falsehood of modern Spiritualism. It is our business to deal with it in this sketch solely as illustrating the career of Mr. Barkas, and so far as it throws light on the man with whom we are dealing; and we may take occasion to say that, apart from his beliefs and labours in this special field of inquiry, he is in other ways an admirable specimen of your genuine hard-headed and self-reliant North countryman.

Mr. Barkas is a genuine Novocastrian, having been born in the Rigg Market, on the 5th of March, 1819, in a dwelling-house over the Coach and Horses, now being rebuilt by Messrs. Bainbridge and Co. as an addition to their extensive premises. His father, William Barkas, was a partner in the firm of Pallister and Barkas, builders, Marshall's-court, Newgate-street, and latterly in High Friar-street, and his mother was a daughter of Mr. Thomas Pallister. His first teacher was Mr. Joseph Cowell, who ultimately became a town missionary. He afterwards attended the classes of Mr. Anderson in Prudhoe-street, and Messrs. Richardson, Renton and Wilson, in Lisle-street. Contemporary reports speak of him as having considerable aptitude for learning, although inclined to be indolent. In 1833 he was apprenticed to Ralph Potts, foreman to Messrs. Pallister and Barkas; and his father (who for some time had been the acting partner in the firm) dying a few months after, he suddenly found himself at the head of the establishment, as Mr. Pallister took little interest in it then. He carried on the business for ten years, and maintained his brother and two sisters. In his leisure time he devoted himself to literary and scientific studies, and in 1843 he entered on a lecturing tour throughout the country. In 1846 he purchased the bookselling business of Mr. Robert Fletcher, and carried it on successfully until 1870, when he disposed of it, and joined Mr. Tweedy in the lease of the Central Exchange Art Gallery, Grainger-street.

As might have been expected, the entrance of Mr. Barkas and his partner on a lease of the Central Exchange marked an era in the history of Grainger's magnificent interior. It was originally designed as a habitation for the corn business of the North of England, but the erection of the Town Hall, and the provision made there for the convenience of the corn merchants, prevented it ever being utilised for such a purpose. Previous to its rental by Messrs. Barkas and Tweedy, a news-room, with a subscription list of a few hundreds, represented nearly the total of its usefulness. By a more liberal provision of newspapers, magazines, and other publications which go to make up a first-class news-room for the accommodation of business men and men of leisure, and the institution of interesting and instructive exhibitions—embracing social, educational, and scientific subjects—the membership rapidly increased, and the public were provided with a place of entertainment of a class never before attempted in the town. First-class vocal and instrumental concerts were also introduced, and with the aid of Mr. John H. Amers as director and bandmaster, an impetus has been given to the taste for high-class music in Newcastle and the North of England, the extent and value of which cannot be estimated. A permanent exhibition of modern pictures and articles of certu is a feature of the place, and special collections and pictures by the most eminent artists, alive and dead, are from time to time submitted to public view by the lessees, or by the best known art dealers in the kingdom. Mr. Tweedy retired from the partnership in January, 1884, when Mr. Charles E. Barkas was admitted a partner, and has since then taken the leading share in the management of the place. At the present time Messrs. Barkas and Son have a subscription list of over 2,000 members, and the popularity of the place is on the increase.

For more than forty years Mr. Barkas has been a frequent and popular lecturer on scientific and literary subjects in Newcastle and elsewhere, and within his knowledge, it would be difficult to find a more capable or attractive lecturer. His manner is good, and his matter is always clear and precise, and his oratorical powers are considerable. As a boy, and as a young man, his attention was greatly drawn to scientific and literary studies, and the opportunities afforded him as a bookseller were so thoroughly utilised that it is sometimes said of him—with considerable truth—that he knows more or less on most subjects of human inquiry. His fulness in the knowledge of the past has not, in his mature years, dulled his interest in new discoveries and speculations. Indeed, he seizes these with all the ardour and enthusiasm of youth, and frequently in his zeal stands up for a novel theory long after it has been generally discredited and even departed from by its original parent. This illustrates the singular youthfulness of his mind, if I may be allowed the phrase, and the courage with which he holds to his opinions in spite of the ridicule and humorous badinage of his friends and critics. This has been singularly manifested in the quiet, yet unasserting steadfastness which has characterised him in his relations to modern Spiritualism. Severe criticism, ridicule, and even charges of quackery have been launched at him for a period of nearly thirty years, without having the slightest impression on his convictions and his modes of making them known to all whom they may interest or concern. Speaking from a lengthened intimacy with Mr. Barkas, and from a considerable acquaintance with what he has said and written in connection with so-called modern Spiritualism, I implicitly believe in his honesty and truthfulness. His sanguine temperament, singular in one of his years, leads him to attach a higher importance to manifestations than would be accorded by a more coldly critical mind, but of his faith in his own diagnosis there cannot, I think, be the slightest question. This being so, his calm and collected bearing throughout years of ridicule and trenchant criticism is to me a most remarkable characteristic of the man. It is equally suggestive of his placid temper that he has never uttered or written an unkindly word, or shown the slightest irritation against the most sarcastic or severe among his numerous critics. A glance at his leading contributions to the study and explanation of Spiritualism will show how earnest and unintermittent his devotion to it has been.

His first letter on Spiritualism appeared in the Newcastle Chronicle in January, 1854, and was speedily followed by a series in the North of England Advertiser, to which there were many answers by letter. These were followed by a series of twenty letters in the same paper, in reply to which were many editorial articles and letters from leading correspondents. In 1862 he published an octavo volume, entitled "Outlines of Inquiries into the Alleged Phenomena of Modern Spiritualism," which was favourably received. Between that time and 1870 only occasional letters were written on the subject. At the latter date, Mr. Barkas entered upon the investigation of the phenomena of materialisation of human forms, and devoted five years to their elucidation, during which period he wrote many papers on the subject in local newspapers, and in The Medium, Spiritualist, Human Nature, Banner of Light, and other periodicals. In 1875 he entered on the investigation of psychological phenomena, through the mediumship of a non-professional lady, and sat with her for upwards of forty séances of three hours each. The whole of the time was given up to questions and answers—the questions being asked for the most part by Mr. Barkas, and the answers being written by the hand of the medium. The whole of the manuscript books in which the questions and answers were written are in his possession, and from it he has published elaborate papers in the Psychological Review, Human Nature, The Spiritualist, and elsewhere, and he is at present engaged in publishing full reports of these marvellous séances in a London weekly paper entitled "LIGHT." Three of those papers have now been issued and the remainder will continue to be published at short intervals. The questions and answers have reference to optics, acoustics, music, the science of music, musical instruments, electricity, magnetism, psychology, physiology, anatomy, pneumatics, heat, light, the future state, &c., &c. All the answers were written by an imperfectly educated woman, and Mr. Barkas is of opinion that no living man or woman could answer the questions so well under similar conditions.

It is not my province here to enter into any discussion as to the verity or falsehood of spirit manifestations, but I may be allowed to express my regret that they have withdrawn Mr. Barkas's attention to a large extent from the study of natural history, geology, and astronomy. Lectures and essays on these by him are familiar to me, which were admirable examples of what elementary teaching of such subjects should be, in order to attract and retain the attention of the young. He frequently lectures on these topics still, but the engrossing attractions of Spiritualism have greatly circumscribed his labours in that direction. True, he still sweeps the sky with his telescope, and favours us, now and again, with any new or singular appearance he "happens on" in the starry spaces, and in this way he has come to be accepted as an honorary city astronomer. Atmospheric phenomena command a considerable share of his attention, and he rarely misses being "in at the death," personally or by deputy, when shooting stars, meteors, or a more than ordinarily brilliant Aurora Borealis illuminate the midnight sky. But Spiritualism is his hobby, and a friend of mine in speaking of his papers now appearing in "LIGHT" humorously dubs him the St. Thomas of a modern Apocalypse.

As a man and a citizen, Mr. Barkas's record is beyond reproach. We have seen him, when mother and father were called away, sturdily and successfully stand by his younger brother and sisters, nor did they pass out of his "helping ken" even after they were grown up. Immersed in his favourite studies, in his younger days he rarely mixed himself up with public concerns, but his fellow citizens had made a note of his capacity to serve them, and about twenty years ago he was elected a member of the Corporation, and represented St. Andrew's Ward, until he was elevated to the aldermanic bench a couple of years ago. He is a rigid attender to the duties of his office as a representative of the people in the Council Chamber and in committee, and, although not so frequent a speaker as many of his confrères, he never rises to discuss a question without throwing some fresh light upon it. He, doubtless, has his friends, but he is not a party man, otherwise his abilities would have enabled him to occupy a much more important position in our local Parliament, but we question if he would have been so useful a public servant as he is in his independent rôle. Mr. Barkas is a member of the Unitarian body.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL"
ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.*

PLATE IV.—BUST OF JOHN KING.

I have here attempted to represent the apparition, as a bust, of the well-known "John King," the leader of that "band" of "spirits" regularly manifesting at séances held with the celebrated physical medium, Mr. Husk. As far as the circumstances under which the illustration is produced would allow, the representation given in Pl. IV. is a portrait of the familiar "spirit"—that is to say: it resembles his usual features as seen when materialised through this medium. I must remark that although in apparitions the type of the medium is invariably to some extent preserved, "John King," nevertheless, possesses characteristic features of his own, to which I will refer later on. I, some years ago, saw this identical "spirit" materialised through another medium, and noticed a remarkable difference from the now more usual exhibition through Mr. Husk. But before engaging myself in the contribution of a short biography of this well-known "spirit," I must make the observation that there are several séance-room "spirits" of the same name and title, appearing at almost every séance-room, both in this country and in America, and who are, as far as I have been able to ascertain, all different individualities, assuming or having been endowed with the same pseudonym. The confusion and misapprehension to which a similar abuse of nicknaming "spirits" has led, must have often been felt by many investigators. It impedes research, further encumbers the still perplexing difficulty of establishing the identity of séance-room "spirits," and, what is even more regrettable, the majority of these enigmatical beings actually prefer being addressed under some fictitious name and title, rather than give a satisfactory account of their past doings and the real name they bore in earth-life. Hence, it is almost impossible to obtain any satisfactory information as to the antecedents of any séance-room "spirit" with whom we may from time to time become acquainted. In the case of the "John Kings" all pretend to be "the buccaneer who lived on earth during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, whose name was Henry de Morgan, afterwards Governor of Jamaica, and who first manifested through the Davenport Brothers." As far as my own experience goes, the various "John Kings" manifesting or materialising through other mediums are, one and all, inferior or less developed beings to Mr. Husk's familiar guide. Judging from the general truthfulness and the high significance of his various communications, I am inclined to accept his own history of both earth and spirit-life, as being true as regards the more important facts. After the Davenports, "John" became, so he says, "attracted" to another medium, and the numerous spiritualistic marvels wrought by "John" during these several years of this sensitive's mediumship, have caused, perhaps, more interest and sensation than any other spiritualistic phenomena previously witnessed in this country. Certain it is that "John" can be traced from his earlier manifestations up to the present regular materialisations through Husk. The latter is now apparently the only person through whose mediumship the identical "John" reappears upon this earthly plane. It is besides an equally undoubted fact that no séance-room "spirit," as yet seen in this country, has achieved the same degree of perfection, either in quality of materialisations or in power of direct voice; for although many other "form" manifestations may be equal in beauty, symmetry of form, or perhaps even superior as regards expression and countenance, none accomplish the astounding feat of speaking with such perfect intonation, whilst appearing in the materialised condition.

My presence at a series of séances, now numbering over 200, at which "John" made his appearance, have enabled me to give a description of the divers wonders produced by this celebrated "spirit," all of which will, I hope, add some further interest to the study of these astounding phenomena.

"John" appears in the form of a bust in all such cases where the medium is seated round the table with the circle. Sometimes the full form may be seen standing behind the medium; this, however, is an exception, and only occurs following an apparition of a bust. My opinion is, that the bust is only material so far as it can be noticed; that there is no "full form," leaning forward, standing between the medium and the table. In many cases there would have been no room for a full form to assume that position; besides, the bust moves too far towards the centre of the table to justify the supposition. The probability of its being the medium transfigured and made to stand up and lean forward, cannot be accepted as an explanation, because the medium's hands are always held, which precaution would not only preclude his moving in a forward direction undetected, but it would also render the arrangement of the drapery round the head and shoulders an utter impossibility. I have on many occasions held the medium's wrist and passed my hand on his fore-arm, and heard him breathe or moan, whilst "John's" bust moved at three feet distance in front of us. Once I heard medium and bust in conversation. In all probability this kind of form-manifestation belongs to the same class as the moving hands or floating heads which have frequently been observed at physical séances. Although the difficulty to account for the possible sustenance of a solid object without a visible fulcrum should not be overlooked (for with our limited knowledge of occult laws it is unexplainable), it need not stand in the way of admission of a fact, because the reality of that fact can be witnessed by every investigator, at almost every séance held with Husk. I have often been reminded by students of nature that these materialisations are, primâ facie, impossibilities, because "nature" requires, for the development of an adult form, as many as thirty-five years or more, and that, consequently, a similar occurrence cannot take place in as many seconds. In reply to this not impertinent objection I would simply refer to the facts themselves. The gradual growth of any creature through so-called ordinary laws is from a certain point of view as much a miracle; and a materialisation is not a violation, but a deviation from, if not an improvement upon, natural laws, i.e., as laws known to the quasi-omniscient authorities.

An equally astounding feat often performed by "John King" is the dematerialisation either of his full form or his bust. In each case the drapery vanishes like smoke and never accumulates in pleats. I have also noticed a partial disintegration of this "spirit's" temporary body, viz., that of his right foot, which, upon request, was made slowly to diminish in size and sharpness of outline until it became totally invisible. On another occasion, after his hand had been removed from a luminous slate, I could notice its slow disintegration, not by decrease of quantity, as in the previous case, but by a different process for which, as yet, we have no name. The hand grew in dimension, but lost its distinct outline and gradually became more and more cloudy, until it attained an enormous size, then lost form and disappeared like mist before the wind. During its latter stages it had the appearance of a shadow cast on a distant wall, but being white instead of dark.

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

A Plea for Unbelievers. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have to thank those gentlemen who have so kindly and courteously replied to my article which appeared in "LIGHT" of April 18th, and if I have been somewhat tardy in tendering my thanks, my delay must be excused on the ground of absence from home, and pre-occupation with other matters.

The only one of those replies that appears to me to call for any remark is that by the well-known and able translator of Zöllner, "C.C.M." Of course, I could not for a moment suppose that either he, or any other thorough Spiritualist, would concur with me in all I said in that article; but I am considerably surprised to find that they are, one and all, with me in what I meant to be the chief object in writing it; I mean with respect to the absence or defect of evidence for outside investigators; and when the corroboration comes from such a pen as that of "C.C.M.," it leaves, I am sorry to think, but little hope of my conversion.

With regard to the precise nature of faith, and the mental processes involved in belief, it is but natural that there should be some and even considerable difference of opinion. Psychology is, at the best, but a science of hypotheses; there is not even a general consensus of opinion as to the very meaning of the terms employed; and the operations of that subtle and ethereal form of matter, which we call mind, unlike those of physical science, and still more unlike the processes of mathematical proofs, are so recondite and complicated, that it is and must ever be impossible that any two thinkers, viewing the subject from different standpoints, should come to the same conclusions upon any given one of its operations.

Now, it appears, from the remarks of "C.C.M.," that the chief point of difference between that gentleman and myself lies in this: I attribute my failure in spiritualistic belief to either a want of, or defect in the, evidence, while he regards it as the result of an intellectual defect of my mind arising from mental preconceptions of what is possible or probable; in other words, I regard it as objective, he as subjective. Possibly he may be right, for mental inability is, I regret to say, only too common a phenomenon; but in this case, and I do not think I am influenced by amour propre, I think "C.C.M." is wrong, and with all deference to so great an authority, I think I can prove it; nay more, I think that when we examine carefully what "C.C.M." remarks, and divest it of the mist and confusion arising from the somewhat loose employment of terms, it will be seen that "C.C.M.," so far from differing from me on the subject of belief and unbelief, will be found only to have stated my own opinions in somewhat different language.

I think I am right in maintaining that the terms preconception, prejudice, probable, terms which are sufficiently accurate in their general meaning for ordinary colloquial usage, fail entirely when thus employed in close and exact reasoning. When "C.C.M." speaks of preconceptions of the probable and the possible, it means simply this: that there already exist in my mind certain beliefs and unbeliefs upon certain subjects; you may call them preconceptions if you will, but they are as much forms of belief as any other kind of faith, and are caused precisely in the manner I have pointed out, viz., by the mutual reaction of objective facts, or phenomena, upon a sentient and perceptive intelligence.

The very terms, prejudice and probable, when viewed in the light of their connotation, their only true meaning, point out this fact. A prejudice is something that has been judged before; and judgment always connotes the result of evidence upon a discerning mind.

So, too, the words probable and improbable. An improbable thing means simply something that has not been proved or tested; and how can anything be proved or tried if not by experience or facts? If this be so, the expression "A predisposition to reject or believe" expresses an impossible condition of the mind. We can have no previous conviction, or predisposition, either one way or the other, upon a subject of which we are entirely ignorant; and the moment information sets in we begin to accumulate evidence, and the reaction of that evidence results in a belief or disbelief of some sort, more or less correct, or incorrect, as the case may be, for I am contending for the fact and not for its accuracy. I only maintain that it is the legitimate product of the two factors—mind and evidence.

Take, for example, a person whose mathematical knowledge is limited to the ordinary rules of arithmetic: ask him if he believes in the binomial theorem. He can give you no answer; he has neither preconception nor prejudice, for he knows absolutely nothing about it. Then tell him that it is something in mathematics, by means of which you can raise the sum of two quantities to any given power, say $(a + x)$ or $(24 + 25)$ to the sixth power, without going through the ordinary long process of multiplication. What then happens? He already has some beliefs—preconceptions—about the possibilities of multiplication, and the new belief which he is called upon to accept clashes with this existing belief which he has gained by experience; so that it is not unlikely he will disbelieve the other; at least, I have found such cases. Of course, I am not justifying his denial any more than I do my own refusal to believe Spiritualism; I merely quote it as an illustration of my assertion that belief and unbelief are entirely outside our own volition, and are both the product and the measure of the force of the evidence brought to bear.

In the case I have cited—a very simple one, I admit—the man would probably challenge me by giving me two numbers to work out, watching me while I did it, and then testing the same by his own simpler process; the coincidence of the two results must, I think, result in convincing him that the theorem is true. The application of this example to the case of Spiritualism in question is, I think, clearly obvious.

If I did let Pussy escape from the bag I certainly had no intention or desire of keeping her in; but whether it be an intellectual defect, or whether it be the legitimate process of logical reasoning, I feel sure that no evidence short of personal observation, which I suppose is the animal in question, and that, too, of the most rigid and exacting nature, will ever convince me, and as "C.C.M." tells me that this is not likely to be forthcoming, I must, and I grieve to say it, carry my grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, and wait patiently for the éclaircissement till I pass to the other side.

"C.C.M." observes that in nature "nothing is probable or improbable." Here he uses the words in their accurate meaning, and he is perfectly correct, since we cannot try or test phenomena before they have occurred. At the same time if he uses the words as he employs them elsewhere he is not correct, for there are many things which are likely to happen—the ordinary usage of probable—while there are others which in the same sense are improbable. For example, it is not impossible, but it is highly improbable, that a heavy body will remain in the air unsupported. Why? Because I have a belief, induced by a vast experience, that it does not, and cannot; and, until I have other experiences as undeniable and irrefragable as the former, I must disbelieve any statements, however numerous, that such phenomena do occur.

Lastly, "C.C.M." comes down on me with, what I suppose is meant to be, a mighty argumentum ad hominem. When he asks me what fraction of the vox populi I require, I simply reply by quoting an historic fact, so often used in these pages, for a very different purpose. A single, solitary man once asserted, against the face of the whole world, contra vocem populi totam, that the world moved, and not the sun. Experience proved that the unit man was correct and the populi wrong; though both populus and astronomer derived their faith from phenomenal experience; in the one case the phenomena were illusive, in the other conclusive.

S. W. WATSON.

The Society for Psychical Research and Mr. Eglinton. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—My attention has been called to a letter from Mr. Pease, published in "LIGHT" of March 14th, wherein it is stated that "practically no phenomena of any sort" were obtained at any of a series of séances, with Mr. Eglinton as medium, held about a year ago by himself and other members of the Society for Psychical Research.

This statement is correct as regards five of the séances, but the remaining one was attended by good manifestations, raps being heard in various parts of the room. Further, one of the sitters was touched on the shoulder as by a child's hand, and objects were moved about the room.

At this and the subsequent series to which Mr. Eglinton has referred in the letter which appeared in your issue of the 21st March, Mr. Pease was not present.

Minor phenomena were obtained at these later séances, as Mr. Eglinton has already stated.

Mr. Eglinton will, however, I think, agree with me that the results were not of such a nature as to carry conviction to the minds of those who, however unbiassed they might be, were not yet acquainted with the great facts of Spiritualism.—Faithfully yours,

FRANK T. HUGHES.

Passage of Matter through Matter. To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have had some experiences in this wonderful and inexplicable phenomenon which I should like briefly to record. The threading of a chair round the arm while the hands are joined is of frequent occurrence, and generally takes place in the dark, but it occurred once in my house in the light. Mr. Herne was the medium, and his hand was held at the time by one of our leading business men, who called attention to the fact, and asserted most positively that there could be no doubt about it. He had never seen anything of the kind before, and was greatly astonished.

I have had iron rings placed round my arm. The most striking instance was at the Eddy's, in America, in whose house I spent a fortnight, witnessing phenomena every day. I gave a full account of my experiences at the time in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, also in the Medium. William Eddy, the elder brother, sits for materialisation only, and Horatio has a dark séance, followed by a light one. The light séance is conducted as follows: At one end of the séance room is a recess formed by the projection of the chimney stack. A string is tied across, about five feet above the floor, upon which a shawl is hung. The medium sits with his back against the shawl, and one of the audience sits beside him, holding his hands, and the phenomena take place behind the shawl. Musical instruments are played upon, and hands and arms appear, and on any one holding a card and pencil, supported on a book, near the shawl, the spirit hand will take up the pencil and write, and throw the card written upon towards the person it is intended for; afterwards writing on other cards in the same way. I have cards written by this method that were done within a few inches of my face in the full light of a paraffin lamp. On one occasion while I sat beside the medium, a large and beautifully white arm was extended over our shoulders and pointed to a ring that was lying on a table, and, on its being brought forward, the spirit took it behind the shawl, and the next minute I felt a sort of galvanic shock and found the ring round my arm, although my hand was in close contact with Horatio Eddy. The ring was made of iron, and as it was lying about at all times there was ample opportunity of proving that it was not a trick ring but a genuine one. The important features in this case were that the manifestation took place in the light and that the agency was visible and palpable. I had also, whilst in America, some remarkable experience with a box, illustrating the phenomena in question, a detailed account of which I gave in "LIGHT," No. 46, November 19th, 1881.

In the presence of several persons, who all certified to the fact, a variety of beautiful flowers, two newspapers, and a photograph went into a box that was locked and sealed and the lid and sides united with gummed paper. It was proposed to try the experiment with a glass globe with no opening, but I could not procure such a thing, and before I could get one made I left Boston. The medium, Mrs. Thayer, seemed pretty certain it could be done.

The passage of matter through matter was of almost daily occurrence with the Davenport Brothers, and as I was intimately associated with them during several months, I had frequent opportunities of witnessing the phenomenon through their mediumship.

A full account of the case alluded to by Dr. Wyld, of a ring being placed round a medium's neck, was published in the Banner of Light about seven or eight years ago. I wish friend Colby would republish it. It would be of interest at the present time.—I remain, yours faithfully,

INQUIRERS AND INQUIRIES.

By "M.A. (OXON.)"

No. I.

There has been much said recently about the use of Spiritualism, and of the difficulties of inquirers. Some have been disposed to think that Spiritualism is without demonstrable use, and that inquirers find unreasonable difficulty in satisfying themselves as to the reality of its phenomena. And, no doubt, to some minds Spiritualism is quite useless, as much so as spectrum analysis would be; for they want to know something which can be turned into money—the winner of the Derby, a hidden treasure of some defunct buccaneer, or what not—and this useful knowledge is denied them. No doubt, too, some inquirers do find a great difficulty in satisfying their own minds in their own way (and they can satisfy them in no other way) of the reality of the objective phenomena of Spiritualism. It is by no means true or even fair to say, as so many frequently say, that any one who will take the pains can easily satisfy himself. It is not given to everybody to get to Corinth. I cannot tell why, but this I know, that the best intentions, the most earnest desire, the most painstaking care, do not always intronit the observer within the charmed circle of phenomena which are familiar to the Spiritualist. I do not know why; perhaps the "Intelligent Operator at the other end of the line" knows more. But so it is, and we must make the best of it.

I am ready, therefore, to acknowledge that Spiritualism has no uses for some minds, and that it is inaccessible as a personal experience to others. "What is the use of a new-born baby?" said Franklin to a similar querist. It will grow and develop into a boon or a pest to society, according to the conditions of growth accorded to it. So will Spiritualism. If I were asked to cross a knife-edge between two mountains, with a precipice on either side, I should say, "No; my head will not stand it," or, if I were offered some answer to a question, which answer postulated a knowledge, say, of the Higher Mathematics, I should say, "This is useless to me"; or, "This is not within my comprehension; I have not the antecedent knowledge to understand and assimilate it." So it is with regard to the many problems that lie below the surface of what is generically named Spiritualism. It is very easy to propound questions to which either no answer is possible in our present state of existence, or which we have not adequate knowledge to reply to comprehensively, or the answer to which the querist himself has not the antecedent knowledge to understand. He may have, as Dr. W. B. Carpenter once put it, "no niche in his mind into which such things will fit." He has, perhaps, been bothered by injudicious friends, and so has set himself to "look into" these matters when he had no better thing to do, on a spare evening; but he does not really want the thing called Spiritualism with its information, its bizarre phenomena, and its inevitable upsetting of previous ideas. He regards it curiously, impatiently, perhaps irritably; but he would never voluntarily have meddled with it at all. It is injudicious proselytism, the ill-directed enthusiasm of some mind, that is so full of its new-found knowledge that it must needs try to force it on all the human race, prepared or unprepared, that has stimulated a spurious and short-lived inquiry, in itself a mere sham, and possessing no more than a butterfly vitality. The mental soil must have been previously prepared by a long course of tillage before the seeds can germinate, and even then the analogy respecting the few that come to fruition holds good.

It is for these and kindred reasons that not all questions airily propounded about Spiritualism can find convincing answers. We do not know; we cannot convey the desired information; or we are at a loss ourselves by reason of contradictory information that we have received.

But why should information be contradictory? Why should it not? The world of spirit would seem to be peopled by beings of infinitely varying grades of intelligence. We supply them, or some of them, ourselves from this world of ours, and we know that it is so. We receive their answers, and we are confirmed in our opinion. Some know little, and pretend, like any histrionic mind amongst us, to pose as omniscient. Some have their definite work on the physical plane—materialisation, for instance—and can no more answer abstruse philosophical questions than the nearest newly-enfranchised farm-labourer can expound the mysteries of proportional representation. But none the less the questions are put, and the replies are contradictory, superficially or essentially. Well, I could easily propound a question which would elicit confident but contradictory replies from, say, the Archbishop of Canterbury, Herbert Spencer, Frederick Harrison, Tyndall, and Ingersoll. There is nothing strange in variety or irreconcilability of opinion, even when each is dogmatically laid down as law.

It is not quite reasonable that we should be asked to give an all-round reply to every question, or to reply categorically to what may be said as to the uselessness of much that is heard and read of in connection with Spiritualism. And there are further reasons, which will necessitate a further treatment.

AN INQUIRER in Blackburn desires to join some good circle in that town, and also to correspond with any Spiritualist of experience who can give him instruction.

DIRECT WRITING.—M. Lyle, of St. Louis, Missouri, writes:—"We have among us a medium, G. V. Cordingly, at whose séances I have been present. In full light, on slates held by him on the shoulder of a sitter, long messages have been written relating to things unknown to all present. I have had him to séances at my own house, and have witnessed there the same phenomenon with slates of my own providing."

HYPNOSCOPIC INVESTIGATIONS.—We have received a lithographed article from Herr Gustav Gessmann, of Vienna, in which he claims to have discovered an improved hypnoscope. It will be within the knowledge of our readers that Dr. J. Ochorowicz described in La Lumière Electrique a little invention by which he claimed to be able to discover whether any given person is hypnotically sensitive. By experiment, on persons of all conditions taken at random, he found that the number of hypnotisable subjects was 37 per cent. Herr Gessmann, by an ingenious arrangement of four magnets, says that he eliminates several objections, and finds a larger percentage, viz., 86 out of 130. If the hypnoscope is of any value the writer's design is no doubt a great improvement on that of Dr. Ochorowicz. The author will be pleased to send a copy of his paper to those who apply for it. His address is Herr Gustav Gessmann, k. k. Mil. Beamten in Neubau Burg-gasse 11, 2 Stock, Vienna.

CLAIRVOYANT EXPERIENCE.

(FROM Le Messager, MAY 1ST.)

Our esteemed friend, Dr. Wahu, vouches for the truthful character of M. P., a distinguished artist, who communicated to him the following experience of his wife's clairvoyance. She was a lady of great refinement and sensitiveness. Soon after their marriage he discovered that she was easily magnetised by him, and that in the magnetic sleep she was highly lucid. She went into the sleep with such facility that passes were not required, he had only to exercise his will; her eyes, if he so willed, remained open, so she might be in a state of somnambulism and no one but himself know it.

He used to magnetise her for her health; and then by her mouth prescriptions and hygienic directions were given; she knowing nothing of medicine.

She would ask him to magnetise her and put questions. He once asked how it was that walls did not obstruct her vision; she said, "I do not see. I know."

When in the sleep she sometimes spoke of herself as if she were another person; for instance, she would say, "She must not do so and so; it will not be good for her." Between themselves they got to speak of this other person, although they knew nothing of Spiritism, as the spirit.

Madame P. having more than once, in the waking state, expressed uneasiness lest this unseen individual might be interposing between her and her husband, he took an opportunity, when she was in the sleep, of explaining the situation to "the spirit," and through Madame P.'s mouth it was said, "I am a spirit-friend; your wife must not be jealous; I love both, and desire your mutual happiness." She was tranquil about this afterwards.

Once in a frolicsome mood she scribbled nonsensical words and unmeaning marks on a sheet of paper, and laughingly said, "I wonder if the spirit could copy that!" He folded the paper, and put it in a drawer; then he put her into the sleep, handed her pen and paper, and she quickly covered the paper with marks and scribble. On waking, they compared the two, and found them to be exactly alike.

Being pregnant, she told her husband several times, in the magnetic sleep, that he was to have a daughter. On one of these occasions he asked how she knew, and it was said through her mouth "She sees the child." When the time came, at her own request, he put her into the sleep, and kept her in it until all was over. The midwife in attendance had no notion of her being in any but the ordinary state. When it was over, the child was found to be a girl, and the mother had felt no pain.

It is some years since M. P. endured the grief of losing his wife through an accidental fall.

Dr. Wahu says: "I would remark that true magnetism is an action upon an incarnated spirit by another incarnated spirit, and is near, in religious degree, to Spiritism, in which there is the action upon an incarnated spirit by a disincarnated spirit. In the case here stated, there was a combination of spiritual with magnetical effects."

THE next Conversazione of the London Spiritualist Alliance will be held in the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, on Thursday, June 25th, at 8 p.m. (Regent-street Entrance), when Mr. T. Shorter will deliver an address on "Modern Spiritualism; the Progressive Development of its Phenomena."

MAGNETISM.—History informs us that the religions in different ages and countries observed various modes of preparing the magnetic condition requisite for receiving spiritual influence: fasting, sacrifice, music, incense, gazing at lights and at crystals—the Urim and Thummim of the Hebrews for instance. By some of these processes trance was induced, such as St. Paul speaks of, and as were experienced by the Hebrew prophets. The modes of imparting spiritual gifts to others are described as the laying on of hands, gazing, breathing, contact of garments, &c. The Hebrew prophets had schools for developing spiritual gifts. —REV. R. H. HAWES.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXVIII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Revised Old Testament, presented to Her Majesty and now distributed to the English reading world, has been a sensation of the day. The chief change has been the omission of the unpleasant English word Hell, and the substitution of the Hebrew Sheol. The other changes are not of much significance. The poetry of the Psalms, Job, Isaiah, &c., is printed in separate lines like other poetry. The miracles and spiritual manifestations remain intact. The world was made in six days, and the sun stood still for Joshua to finish his fight; also an angel appears to Saul in presence of that ancient medium, the Witch of Endor.

If the now happily revised sacred volumes, old and new, can be depended upon for accuracy of statement, the spiritual manifestations from Genesis to Revelations were, in a multitude of cases, very similar to those we have at the present day. The Acts of the Apostles contain a series of miracles, which need just the confirmation that our present marvels give them. To a large extent, therefore, modern Spiritualism contradicts the scepticism of materialistic scientists. Since miracles do happen now, they may have happened at any and all times. The writing on a slate with Mr. Eglinton is as stupendous a miracle as the writing on the palace wall at Nineveh. If our preachers had just a little more knowledge they would see how the present may confirm the past, and the past the present.

Let me make one little remark as to the character of some manifestations. In thirty odd years of careful investigation I have encountered one case of fraud, two or three lying spirits, and in two or three cases, rude, unmannerly, and violent manifestations. I have had my chair suddenly snatched from under me—which is not pleasant or polite. I have seen two mediums violently thrown upon the floor, apparently very narrowly escaping serious injuries. Considering the millions of rude, disorderly, dishonest, and immoral people constantly passing into the spirit world, I think it is wonderful that we have so few disorderly and disagreeable manifestations. If we lose hell out of our revised Bible, we must be glad of Sheol and Gehenna. As Christ preached to the spirits in prison it seems probable that Mr. Spurgeon, Newman Hall, Henry Ward Beecher, and all the popular preachers may have a similar mission.

Dr. George MacDonald strongly recommended some "Letters from Hell," translated from the German. Many readers have probably been disappointed—for the hell patronised by the Scottish preacher, novelist, and poet is a cold, foggy, uncomfortable place, somewhat like a Highland glen in a wintry Scottish mist, where people atone for old escapades by getting into new ones. Dante has a frozen hell; but the hot, sulphurous ones are most popular.

The "Letters from Hell" have been reprinted in New York, and the Banner of Light notes that Dr. MacDonald's principal object in promoting its circulation is "to make righteous use of the element of horror." But most Governments have done that in wars, persecutions, and capital punishment. The happy thing is that, with very rare exceptions, no one thinks of any horrible place as the probable residence of his own friends and relations. Does any one, Papist or Protestant, believe that his parents or children are really tenants of the orthodox hell? Is it not always other people's parents and children?

The lesson of Spiritualism as to these matters seems to me entirely reasonable. The incident of death, the dropping of the diseased, worn out, useless body, brings no sudden change to men's thoughts, feelings, or characters. The man who dies to-day will be the same man to-morrow that he was yesterday, with an added experience. He will not, by the fact of getting out of his body, become either angelic or satanic. He will gain a greater freedom, a more extended vision, and powers of locomotion. Progress in knowledge and goodness may be very rapid even in the nearer spheres of spirit life. The condition of every being may be supposed to correspond to his nature, character, or tendencies. This is, so far as I know, the uniform testimony of our spirit friends. The heavens and hells of Milton and the poets are alike unknown in the world of spirits. Every one finds the place or state which naturally belongs to him.

I observe that Mrs. Groom, so well known in Birmingham and the Midlands, is coming to London. She has been very successful in Halifax, where the interest in her public addresses and clairvoyant descriptions of persons in the spirit world is described as "intense." Considering that she is a simple, uneducated woman, the matter and manner of her discourses are quite remarkable. Of her visit to Bacup, a curious cotton town in Lancashire, Mr. J. Brown writes: "On Sunday afternoon, Mrs. Groom's guides took for their subject 'Our Spirit Homes'; in the evening, 'The New Jerusalem.' It is quite needless for me to say that both of these subjects were dealt with in an attractive manner, the audience being kept completely spell-bound. I am happy to say that her clairvoyant descriptions were a great success, for she gave at the two meetings thirty-seven descriptions, which perfectly captivated the audience."

And we have two of the most widely known speaking mediums, arriving almost at the same time. Mrs. Richmond has crossed the Atlantic to continue her Sunday discourses at the Town Hall, High-street, Kensington; and Mrs. Hardinge Britton is also announced in Lancashire. "Many shall run to and fro in the earth, and knowledge shall be increased." It cannot be complained of now that women have not a large share in all progressive movements. They take degrees in our Universities—they are photographed in collegiate robes and caps for the illustrated journals. They are elected to School Boards—they reign as sovereigns of the fairies as well as hearts.

The Pall Mall Gazette has a virility that makes it very interesting. We know pretty well what most journals will say on most subjects; but the Pall Mall Gazette gives us audacious surprises. For example, it says: "Professor Simon Newcomb maintains in the new number of the Illustrated Science Monthly that Miss Lulu Hurst, the famous 'magnetic girl,' whose marvellous tours de force have created such a sensation in America, is only a woman who possesses great muscular power. So far from the 'rosy country girl' moving heavy objects by merely touching them with her finger tips, he declares that, though she began to touch the object on which she performed with her fingers only, she used the strong palms of her hands to bring about the desired result. Of course, if this is true, the magnetic wonder ceases, but the muscular wonder is more marvellous still. A girl who can, with one hand, lift a chair on which one person sits, while four others hold it down, may well draw full houses, if only as a supreme example of the strength that is sometimes possessed by the weaker sex."

A Dr. Cook, of Cheltenham, has read a paper to the Natural Science Society on "Apparitions: Are they Illusions?" In subjective illusions the optic ganglia, he kindly informs us, are impressed from within, and "figures are projected into space by the brain as on the screen by the magic lantern." Then, of course, he quotes the dagger scene from Macbeth. "The Spiritualists," says Dr. Cook, "attribute certain ill-understood magnetic phenomena to the influence of spirits, which, like Owen Glendower, they profess to be able to call from the vasty deep, and who give information about on a par with that afforded by the mysterious writings of the planchette. I show you in this figure one of the spiritualistic delusions: a photo of a living person, with the faint outline of another figure, a sort of ghost, hovering over—produced by exposing the ghost for a very short period to the sensitive plate, leaving a faint image, and over this an ordinary photo is taken."

Diplomas do not confer, and often do not even register, intelligence, and doctors talk their full share of nonsense; but how a doctor in a paper read before a learned society could be quite so ignorant, is one of the mysteries. Still, after this preamble, he related some excellent ghost stories, which he could not account for, and Dr. Roorko, who followed him, said "It was impossible for them at this time to ignore the widespread movement known as Spiritualism or Spiritism. There had been, no doubt, a great deal of fraud in connection with it, but at the same time it would be unreasonable to pooh-pooh the mass of circumstantial evidence that had been accumulated after most careful investigation, under strict test conditions, as to the occurrence of most surprising phenomena. This evidence had been such as to satisfy men of such scientific eminence as Crookes, a Fellow of the Royal Society, and one of its Medalists; Varley, a distinguished electrician, and Wallace, the eminent naturalist. These were all men of world-wide fame, and many others might be mentioned. He had not witnessed any of these phenomena himself, but he was acquainted with a good deal of the literature of the subject, now grown very voluminous, and there was certainly such a weight of authority as to the genuineness of many of the alleged phenomena, that he was not prepared to deny them until he had had himself the opportunity of testing them."

Here is another "Daniel come to judgment." Somebody writes: "In Spiritualism, if there be any facts demonstrated, they are these—that according to the purity or impurity of the medium's moral character so is the purity or impurity of the influences which surround him, and also that physical phenomena-producing 'mediums' are invariably sooner or later men of very questionable character. The reason for these facts is clear. The 'mediums' have had sapped out, by what are known as 'spooks,' their magnetic thinking essence—in other words, their ethico-material sublimations." Can anyone inform me what the writer means? What are "ethico-material sublimations"? and who, or what are "spooks"?

What is the necessary connection of the quality, whatever it may be, which makes one a medium for physical manifestations, and that which enables a man to tell the truth and refrain from picking pockets? So far as I have had an opportunity of judging, I should say that physical mediums were about equal as to morals to the average lawyer, doctor, or preacher—certainly quite equal to the average shopkeeper in "ethico-material sublimations."

REVIEWS.

HELLENBACH'S BIRTH AND DEATH AS A CHANGE IN THE FORM OF PERCEPTION; OR, THE TWOFOLD NATURE OF MAN.

In the contents page of the above work, as published in No. 221 of "LIGHT," March 28th, the omission of the secondary title tends to mislead your readers with regard to the scope of the book. I think a few glimpses into the interesting train of thought which is laid down in this work by this great philosopher may not be unwelcome to the readers of "LIGHT."

The author starts with the supposition that a human being (Menschliche Erscheinung) must have some kind of transcendental basis, as this necessarily evinces itself as well through our reasoning powers (Erkenntnis vermögen) as through biological development, even as all great thinkers have accepted such a basis, however much they differed regarding its nature. If, however, such a transcendental basis does exist, then earthly life can only be a transient condition of this indwelling principle or "subject," through which birth and death resolve themselves only into a change of our form of perception, hence, also, of our consciousness.

Now the author argues as follows: All development in nature shows transition states, imperfections, and exceptions; it is, therefore, inconceivable that in the laws of experiences there should not occur cases where the metaphysical basis in certain persons and in certain cases should not clearly show itself. The author appeals then to experience which perfectly justifies his starting point and his argument. With this introduction, the reader will understand the table of contents quite differently.

The whole book is divided into four parts, which treat of the following questions:—

1. The manifestation of the transcendental basis.
2. The severance (Die Spaltung) of the human form.
3. The three hypotheses in explanation of the phenomena.
4. The solution of the problem.

With regard to the first part, experience tells us that, in fact, people do show in dreams or in the somnambule state, and also by visions, another supersensuous power of perception, which justifies the supposition that there is in man a conscious Ego. But as it is not probable that such an existing transcendental basis should reveal itself only through perceptions, and not also through actions or effects, he again asks of experience, which proves that some persons do possess a supersensuous manner of action, as

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

At the meeting of this society, on the 13th inst., the president, Dr. Anna Kingsford, read a paper entitled "The Method of the Mystics," of which the following is a brief summary:—

The solution of the religious problem offered by the method of the mystics appears to be that which is destined to triumph in the present age. This is no new method, but one that has been in the world, obscurely and secretly, from the very dawn of religious thought, having its representatives and exponents in the ancient systems of both East and West, Buddhist, Alexandrian, and Christian. Their method consists in regarding the exterior and phenomenal presentation of religion as but the scaffolding necessary to the construction of the edifice—its mythologic scenery, to use Professor Tyndall's expression—and not the religion itself. The true faith is interior and spiritual, and has for ages been in the course of elaboration within and by means of these exterior appliances. Representing an eternal verity, and based in the spiritual consciousness, it is independent of letter and form, tradition and authority, and superior, therefore, to all assaults of intellectual criticism. What this age is witnessing is the removal of the now superfluous scaffolding, and the disclosure, in all its finished perfection, of the true Catholic Church of the future.

The difference between esoteric or popular religion, and mystic or aerotic religion may be thus defined. In the former, sacred personages and occurrences are understood in the physical and obvious sense, as phenomenal and relative, and related to particular times and places, and dependent for verification upon individual testimony. In the system of the mystic, on the contrary, sacred personages and events denote principles and operations which affect the spiritual Ego, and are to this what physical transactions are to the material personality. As these principles and operations belong necessarily to universal experience, they are unrelated to times, places, and persons, and are to be sought, not on the historical plane, but on that of the mind and spirit; not, as the Buddhist would say, in the "worlds of form," but in the "formless worlds."

Images and symbols of religious verities have their true and legitimate use in leading the soul to the apprehension of that which they imply. But when regarded—as the popular religionist regards them—as themselves essentials and co-efficients in spiritual processes, they become instruments of delusion. The essential is related to the essential, the corporeal to the corporeal. The things of God are similar to themselves; the things of Caesar are similar to themselves. To God belong the things of God; to Caesar the things of Caesar. The redemption of the soul cannot be affected by means of coin on which is stamped the image and superscription of the physical. No events occurring in time, no acts of an historical personage, can "save" our souls. These events and acts must be translated into spiritual verities, and realised individually and experimentally, if they are to have any efficacy for the spiritual selfhood.

The method of the mystics consists, then, in transmutation, or the conversion of the terms of the outer into the inner, of the physical into the spiritual; of the temporal and phenomenal into the eternal and noumenal. In them the key of the Scriptures, and of the functions and sacraments of religion, is found in the alchemic secret of transmutation. All the metals, says the alchemist, are gold in their essence, and by an application of the Divine art can be made to appear in their essence. But the uninitiate judge superficially and reject as dross that which the adept knows to be gold. Gold is the alchemic formula for spirit; and as the precious metal lies concealed under the semblance of the baser, so the true secret of all sacred Scripture—its spiritual significance—is hidden under the letter in such wise that, though invisible to the vulgar, it is evident to the eye of the illuminated.

Following, therefore, the invariable rule of his order, and applying to the text of sacred tradition, the "universal solvent" formed by the two words not and within, the mystic sees in the exposition of revelation, from Genesis to the Apocalypse, the history, not of past events in the external and sensible world, but of the soul, and of operations in perpetual process in the sphere to which the soul—whether universal or individual—belongs.—The rest of the paper was devoted mainly to the application of the mystical canon of interpretation to the Bible, numerous citations in support of it being given from the chief Christian and other mystics of the early and middle ages, all of whom, whatever the externals of their faith, were at one in their doctrine and method, these being the same that we are now recovering.

The reading of the paper was, as usual, followed by a discussion, in which several Fellows and visitors took part.

is most clearly evidenced by magnetisers when acting at a distance.

Now the author argues: If the magic force of the will of a person at a distance possesses this power, should not some living amongst us have it? Experience, if asked, confirms the fact that some persons, through unconscious writing or speaking, do act under the influence of an intelligent power.

The existence of a transcendental basis in man is, therefore, confirmed by experience; and vice versa, the principle put forward by the author explains in the simplest manner all kinds of mystical phenomena.

In the second part the author sets forth the proposition that as the transcendental basis perceives and acts, it, therefore, must be organised, and that, consequently, beneath the human organism composed of living cells, another—a meta-organism—must exist. He asks: Is this confirmed by experience? and experience again answers yes! In somnambulists, Hindoo Fakirs and Mahatmas this (meta) organism not only sometimes steps out for the purpose of becoming visible to others at a distance, but human forms are also materialised at séances. Death is, therefore, nothing else than a perfect severance.

In spiritual séances partial forms and imperfect severances also occur, and under apparent severance the author understands that which the Americans call transfiguration, which expression he rejects, because the difference between materialisation and transfiguration only consists in the greater or lesser proximity of the phantom to the medium.

In the third part the author shows that neither fraud nor psychic force, nor the intervention of a spirit-world, can explain the whole field of the phenomena, but that each of the three hypotheses is justifiable in different cases.

Regarding the fourth part, an extract is impossible, because in it there is not a word too much or too little; the reader must read in the original the striking argument by which, upon the principle that birth and death are really only a change in the form of perception, all mystic manifestations find their natural explanation. Only one thing I will point out, that is the definition of a Fakir. A Fakir, according to Hellenbach, is a man who through natural tendency, sickness, religious training, or cultivation of his abnormal powers, or intentional change of his organic disposition has arrived at a partial, but certainly imperfect, use of those metaphysical (transcendental) capacities which are within him, and every other human being, and who can, therefore, do things which lie outside of those natural laws which are known to us.

The reader will admit that this book, by its deductive form, differs from all spiritual works. These disclose to us experiences; sometimes also revelations, and theories; Hellenbach proceeds the opposite way—he quotes spiritual phenomena only as experimental data for his philosophy, through which the latter finds its triumphant confirmation, whilst on the other hand a natural and connected explanation is furnished for the phenomena so often disputed.

H. L.

La Lumière, Paris, reports a séance with Madame Bablin. Among the phenomena was hearing rapid writing at the table; then a sheet of paper was laid on the hand of Madame Grange (editor of La Lumière); it had on it three communications characteristic of the departed individuals whose signatures followed them. Draped spirits manifested themselves, their countenances visible by light emanating from their hands; some of these spirits had promised at a séance elsewhere thus to manifest themselves. The editor of La Lumière remarks: "If you relate such phenomena to those who deny spiritual existence, they tell you that you are the victim of hallucination, or of some conjuring trickery; if to others of the clerical stamp, they vociferate that such appearances must be phantoms caused by devil's magic. . . . Well, both materialists and clericals have much to learn. Such manifestations are becoming more known in private circles, in various quarters remote from each other; a fact confounding to savants, and we may look forward to such mediums as Madame Bablin soon occupying their proper rank in the estimation of the honest and candid. We shall expect the word 'materialism' to be less constantly in the mouths of Spiritualists 'Charlatanism' to be less constantly in the mouths of Spiritualists—among whom, for some time past, a charlatanic optical illusion seems to have epidemically prevailed. The greatest charlatans are not those who have borne the stigma of that name. We rejoice that Madame Bablin now declines receiving at her séances all whom she is not assured are earnest investigators."

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MRS. RICHMOND'S INSPIRATIONAL DISCOURSES.—Mrs. Richmond, whose expected return to London we announced some weeks ago, arrived at Liverpool by the steamship The City of Rome, from New York, on Friday, and resumed her series of discourses at the Kensington Town Hall, London, on Sunday evening last. The hall was well filled. The subject of her address was "Glad Tidings." Spiritualism, it was stated, brought glad tidings to all alike. It was confined to no creed. It was addressed to no special sect or nationality. It invited us to contemplate immortality, and to look beyond the limited sphere of our human existence; to regard the greater and more glorious future that lies beyond the grave. It taught us to regard this life as merely a temporary fraction of our spiritual experience, and to feel assured that, whatever might be our lot in this world, a higher power controlled our destiny, and that whatever we suffered here was designed for our instruction and to lead us to greater perfection. Spiritualism enlarged our vision and our aspirations, and led us to devote ourselves to the good of humanity for humanity's sake, and helped us to endeavour to perceive the reasons and true principles of life and the tendency and objects of the paths of existence. After the address, a poem was given on the following subject, selected by the audience: "Who is God, and where is He?"

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS, 43, MANOR-PLACE, WALWORTH-ROAD.—On Sunday evening last Mr. James Veitch delivered a lecture on "Religious Progress." He clearly showed that all the religions of the past embraced the belief of immortality. Though possibly, as history records, there are many instances where individuals enjoyed the knowledge of actual immortality by being associated with spirit friends and instructors, still, he contended it never was as yet in the history of the world a knowledge which humanity at large grasped and understood. Spiritualism alone gave this knowledge to man, and it therefore demanded consideration and respect. On Sunday, May 24th, Mr. Robson, of Peckham, will be the speaker, and on Sunday, May 31st, Mr. James Veitch will lecture on "Faith Healing."

SHEEPSHALL.—Lectures will be delivered in the Edinburgh Hall, Sheepshale-terrace, Leeds, on Sundays, in the afternoon, at 2.30 and in the evening at 6.30 as follows:—Sunday, May 24th, Mr. Tom Roscoe (Manchester), Inspirational Medium; May 31st, Mr. A. D. Wilson (Halifax); June 7th, Mrs. Leonard Bailey (Halifax), Inspirational and Clairvoyante Medium; June 14th, Mrs. J. S. Schutt (Silsden), Trance Medium; June 21st, Mr. Walter Hillman (Bradford), Trance Medium; June 28th, Mr. R. A. Brown (Manchester), Trance Medium; July 5th, Mrs. Gregg (Leeds), Clairvoyante and Trance Medium; July 12th, Mr. J. B. Tetlow (Rochdale), Trance Medium; July 19th, Mrs. Riley (Bradford), Trance Medium, and Miss Harrison (Bradford), Clairvoyante; July 26th, Mr. William Johnson (Hyde), Trance Medium. A collection is made at the close of every service. An extra lecture will be delivered on Tuesday, June 2nd, by Mr. J. J. Morse, his subject being "Freemasonry; a Mystery, a Science, and a Faith." The chair will be taken at eight o'clock. Admission free.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

J. H. M.—Your name has been added. Thanks.

S. LOWENTHAL.—The MS. needed a little revision. It appears this week.

MISS C. BELLINGHAM.—We have to thank you for your courtesy in sending us the duplicate. We can make good use of it.

R. COOPER.—Thanks for calling our attention to the Boston Sunday Herald. We do not receive it. Can you not get us a copy?

G. NAP-TAESCHLER.—Thanks for the report. We should, however, like further particulars of M. L.—before we publish it. Can you kindly obtain these for us? Stamps received.

HUGH ASHWORTH.—You ask in connection with the divisions amongst Spiritualists, why, if the basis on which Spiritualism is founded is good, this anomaly should exist. We know little beyond the broad outlines of the case, but as far as we can judge, it arises from mistaking sensitiveness for mediumship. This is a very common error amongst some classes of Spiritualists, and while actuated by the best of intentions many otherwise good and earnest people do incalculable harm to the movement, by pushing forward undeveloped sensitives as representatives of spirit-power and action. This has been the rock on which many societies have split. Too great care cannot be exhibited in the public presentation of Spiritualism. "Investigator," in his letter to the Rochdale Times, strikes the key-note when he says: "To do good work you must have good tools." If this does not answer your question, write again giving us fuller details.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. H. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenshtülpe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavaire, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMBERTS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1883), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1882.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANÇAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CHOMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legend, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

ARE THE PHENOMENA OF SPIRITUALISM IN HARMONY WITH SCIENCE?

BY ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.

(From the Boston Sunday Herald.)

"Life is the elaboration of soul through the varied transformations of matter."—Spiritual Evolution.

It is a common, but I believe a mistaken, notion, that the conclusions of science are antagonistic to the alleged phenomena of modern Spiritualism. The majority of our teachers and students of science are, no doubt, antagonistic, but their opinions and prejudices are not science. Every discoverer who has promulgated new and startling truths, even in the domain of physics, has been denounced or ignored by those who represented the science of the day, as witness the long line of great teachers from Galileo in the dark ages to Boucher de Perthes in our own times. But the opponents of Spiritualism have the additional advantage of being able to brand the new belief as a degrading superstition, and to accuse those who accept its facts and its teachings of being the victims of delusion or imposture—of being, in fact, either half-insane enthusiasts or credulous fools. Such denunciations, however, affect us little. The fact that Spiritualism has firmly established itself in our sceptical and materialistic age, that it has continuously grown and developed for nearly forty years, that by mere weight of evidence, and in spite of the most powerful prepossessions, it has compelled recognition by an ever increasing body of men in all classes of society, and has gained adherents in the highest ranks of science and philosophy, and, finally, that despite abuse and misrepresentation, the folly of enthusiasts and the knavery of impostors, it has rarely failed to convince those who have made a thorough and painstaking investigation, and has never lost a convert thus made—all this affords a conclusive answer to the objections so commonly urged against it. Let us, then, simply ignore the scorn and incredulity of those who really know nothing of the matter, and consider, briefly, what are the actual relations of science and Spiritualism, and to what extent the latter supplements and illumines the former.

Science may be defined as knowledge of the universe in which we live—full and systematised knowledge leading to the discovery of laws and the comprehension of causes. The true student of science neglects nothing and despises nothing that may widen and deepen his knowledge of nature, and if he is wise as well as learned he will hesitate before he applies the term "impossible" to any facts which are widely believed and have been repeatedly observed by men as intelligent and honest as himself. Now, modern Spiritualism rests solely on the observation and comparison of facts in a domain of nature which has been hitherto little explored, and it is a contradiction in terms to say that such an investigation is opposed to science. Equally absurd is the allegation that some of the phenomena of Spiritualism "contradict the laws of nature," since there is no law of nature yet known to us but may be apparently contravened by the action of more recondite laws or forces. Spiritualists observe facts and record experiments, and then construct hypotheses which will best explain and co-ordinate the facts, and in so doing they are pursuing a truly scientific course. They have now collected an enormous body of observations tested and verified in every possible way, and they have determined many of the conditions necessary for the production of the phenomena. They have also arrived at certain general conclusions as to the causes of these phenomena, and they simply refuse to recognise the competence of those who have no acquaintance whatever with the facts to determine the value or correctness of those conclusions.

We who have satisfied ourselves of the reality of the phenomena of modern Spiritualism in all their wide-reaching extent and endless variety are enabled to look upon the records of the past with new interest and fuller appreciation. It is surely something to be relieved from the necessity of classing Socrates and St. Augustine, Luther and Swedenborg, as the credulous victims of delusion or imposture. The so-called miracles and supernatural events which pervade the sacred books and historical records of all nations find their place among natural phenomena and need no longer be laboriously explained away. The witchcraft mania of Europe and America affords the materials for an important study, since we are now able to detect the basis of fact on which it rested, and to separate from it the Satanic interpretation which invested it with horror and appeared to justify the cruel punishments by which it was attempted to be suppressed. Local folk-lore and superstitions acquire a living interest, since they are often based on phenomena which we can reproduce under proper conditions, and the same may be said of much of the sorcery and magic of the Middle Ages. In these and many other ways history and anthropology are illuminated by Spiritualism.

To the teacher of religion it is of vital importance, since it enables him to meet the sceptic on his own ground, to adduce facts and evidence for the faith that he professes, and to avoid that attitude of apology and doubt which renders him altogether helpless against the vigorous assaults of Agnosticism and materialistic science. Theology, when vivified and strengthened by Spiritualism, may regain some of the influence and power of its earlier years.

Science will equally benefit, since it will have opened to it a new domain of surpassing interest. Just as there is behind the visible world of nature an "unseen universe" of forces, the study of which continually opens up fresh worlds of knowledge often intimately connected with the true comprehension of the most familiar phenomena of nature, so the world of mind will be illuminated by the new facts and principles which the study of Spiritualism makes known to us. Modern science utterly fails to realise the nature of mind or to account for its presence in the universe, except by the mere verbal and unthinkable dogma that it is "the product of organisation." Spiritualism, on the other hand, recognises in mind the cause of organisation, and, perhaps, even of matter itself, and it has added greatly to our knowledge of man's nature by demonstrating the existence of individual minds indistinguishable from those of human beings yet separate from any human body. It has made us acquainted with forms of matter of which materialistic science has no cognisance, and with an ethereal chemistry whose transformations are far more marvellous than any of those with which science deals. It thus gives us proof that there are possibilities of organised existence beyond those of the material world, and in doing so removes the greatest stumbling-block in the way of belief in a future state of existence—the possibility so often felt by the student of material science of separating the conscious mind from its partnership with the brain and nervous system.

On the spiritual theory man consists essentially of a spiritual nature and mind intimately associated with a spiritual body or soul, both of which are developed in and by means of a material organism. Thus the whole raison d'être of the material universe—with all its marvellous changes and adaptations, the infinite complexity of matter and of the ethereal forces which pervade and vivify it, the vast wealth of nature in the vegetable and animal kingdoms—is to serve the grand purpose of developing human spirits in human bodies.

This world-life not only lends itself to the production, by gradual evolution, of the physical body needed for the growth and nourishment of the human soul, but by its very imperfections tends to the continuous development of the higher spiritual nature of man. In a perfect and harmonious world perfect beings might possibly have been created but could hardly have been evolved, and it may well be that evolution is the great fundamental law of the universe of mind as well as of matter. The need for labour in order to live, the constant struggle against the forces of nature, the antagonism of the good and the bad, the oppression of the weak by the strong, the painstaking and devoted search required to wrest from nature her secret powers and hidden treasures—all directly assist in developing the varied powers of mind and body and the nobler impulses of our nature. Thus all the material imperfections of our globe, the wintry blasts and summer heats, the volcano, the whirlwind and the flood, the barren desert and the gloomy forest, have each served as stimuli to develop and strengthen man's intellectual nature; while the oppression and wrong, the ignorance and crime, the misery and pain, that always and everywhere pervade the world, have been the means of exercising and strengthening the higher sentiments of justice, mercy, charity, and love, which we all feel to be our best and noblest characteristics, and which it is hardly possible to conceive could have been developed by any other means.*

Such a view as this affords us perhaps the best attainable solution of the great world-old problem of the origin of evil; for if it is the very means of creating and developing the higher moral attributes of man, those attributes which alone render him fit for a permanent spiritual existence and for continuous progression, then the mere temporary sin and misery of the world must be held to be fully justified by the supreme nature and permanent character of what they lead to. From this point of view the vision of the poet becomes to us the best expression of the truth. We, too, believe that "All Nature is but Art, unknown to thee;

All Chance, Direction which thou canst not see;
All Discord, Harmony not understood;
All partial Evil universal Good."

Finally, these teachings of modern Spiritualism furnish us with the much needed basis of a true ethical system. We learn by it that our earth-life is not only a preparation for a higher state of progressive spiritual existence, but that what we have usually considered as its very worst features, its all-pervading din and suffering, are in all probability the only means of developing in us those highest moral qualities summarised as "love" by St. Paul and "altruism" by our modern teachers, which all admit must be cultivated and extended to the utmost if we are really to make progress toward a higher social state. The modern philosophers can, however, give no sufficient reason why we should practise these virtues. If, as they teach us, not only our own lives end here, but the life of the whole human race is sure to end some day, it is difficult to see any adequate outcome of the painful self-sacrifice they inculcate, while there is certainly no motive adduced which will be sufficiently powerful to withdraw from selfish pleasures that numerous class which derives from them its chief enjoyment. But when men are taught from childhood that the whole material universe exists for the very purpose of developing beings possessing these attributes, that evil and pain, sin and suffering, all tend to the same end, and that the characters developed here will make further progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world, just in proportion as our higher moral feelings are cultivated here—and when all this can be taught, not as a set of dogmas to be blindly accepted on the authority of unknown ancient writers, but as being founded on direct knowledge of the spirit world, and the continued actual reception of teachings from it, then indeed we shall have in our midst "a power that makes for righteousness."

* This argument applies of course to other worlds and systems, all of which, on the spiritual hypothesis, either have been or will be the scenes of the development of human souls.

Thus, modern Spiritualism, though usually despised and rejected by the learned, is yet able to give valuable aid to science and to religion, to philosophy and to morals. Not only does it offer us a solid basis for a solution of some of the profoundest mysteries of our being, but it affords us a secure hope, founded not on reason and faith only, but on actual knowledge, that our conscious life does not perish with our physical body. To all who will earnestly inquire it gives:—

"The deep assurance that the wrongs of life
Will find their perfect germon! That the scheme
So broken here will elsewhere be fulfilled!
Hope not a dreamer's dream!
Love's long last yearnings satisfied, not still'd!"

MARY HOWITT'S "Reminiscences of my Life" will begin in Good Words for June, and be continued regularly in the same magazine.

VICTOR HUGO.—In "Spiritual Experiences," by R. Cooper, a book published many years ago, we find the following paragraph with reference to Victor Hugo: "While we were at the Salle l'Orient we were visited by Victor Hugo. Receiving an intimation of his coming, we reserved the place of honour for him, immediately in front of the cabinet. After witnessing both séances, he expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the genuineness of the manifestations, and said they far exceeded his expectations; in fact he could not have supposed such things to be possible. I believe I am right in saying that Victor Hugo was, at the time, a believer in spiritual phenomena."

M. D. writes: I am very sorry to see it announced that Mr. Eglington declines to give séances for materialisation. It is true that psychography as displayed at his séances is a perfect proof of spirit power. Slate-writing, as given, for example, to Mr. Gladstone, is inestimable. I have writing on slates, cards, untinted note-paper, in hands perfectly known to me, done under absolute conditions, impossible to be explained on any theory but Spiritualism, which I hold to be of inestimable value; but how forego those materialisations which have brought the realities of the other life to the test of the three senses of sight, hearing, and touch? No! We needed materialisation. We needed, and millions still need, "to feel the touch of a vanished hand," and "to hear the voice that was stilled." Certainly I am very glad to get a written message from a departed friend in his, or her, own handwriting, but to see the beloved form—to hear the loving words—to grasp the very hand we held in life—surely no one would like to lose or miss such an experience?

EVIDENCE AND BELIEF.

As I understand Mr. Watson, he maintains that there can be no preconception or prejudice (pre-judgment), except as belief or unbelief, resulting from contact of the mind with evidence. In a sense that is true, because the evidence must be offered to the mind before there is any conscious attitude of the latter towards it. But did he never hear such expressions as: "I would not believe it if I saw it"; or, "I will not listen to evidence of such nonsense"? Or, to take a less extreme, but not really less significant, case, has he not himself told us that evidence of certain facts must for him be evidence of a particular sort, i.e., personal experience? That is, not that Mr. Watson has examined the testimony of others, and found it insufficient on its merits as testimony, but that he attributes to the alleged facts an improbability the measure of which he assigns by demanding that it should be encountered by his own experience. "An improbable thing," he says, "means simply something that has not been proved or tested." Not been proved or tested by whom? By nobody at all, or only not by oneself? It is evidence that the facts in question have been proved and tested, which Mr. Watson will not credit. He has a right to call a thing improbable which is outside all human experience. But whether the thing is outside human experience is just the question, and upon this point it is surely not rational to refuse human testimony, however critically we may, and ought to, examine it.

The legitimate use of the word "improbable" I conceive to be to denote a presumption, arising from the absence of the degree of evidence which would suffice to establish a particular alleged case of an ordinary known fact of nature, that such evidence will never be forthcoming. A not inconsiderable proportion of admitted human experience is beyond the personal experience of most individuals. No one now, for instance, would call the fall of a meteoric stone improbable, though the phenomenon is rare, and comparatively few have witnessed it.

Mr. Watson, I observe, falls into the common fallacy of confounding what is not conformable to one's own experience with what is contradictory to it. "It is not impossible," he says, "but it is highly improbable, that a heavy body will remain in the air unsupported. Why? Because I have a belief, induced by a vast experience, that it does not, and cannot; and until I have other experiences as undeniable and irrefragable as the former, I must disbelieve any statements, however numerous, that such phenomena do occur." Mr. Watson has no such experience as he alleges, "that it does not, and cannot;" if he had, he would be utterly irrational in seeking for a contradictory personal experience. Only to remark, by the way, that he begs the question by the use of the word "unsupported," unless he knows all the forces in nature by which bodies can be supported in the air, his very offer and wish to personally investigate similar alleged phenomena prove that he does not really regard his experience as having the character he ascribes to it. And so far is it from being true that he "must disbelieve" the statements, that he very evidently has not "disbelieved" them, or he would not have thought them worth following up by investigation. He has simply not believed them—a very different thing from disbelief, if language is to be used as accurately "in exact reasoning" as Mr. Watson desires. He does not assent to these statements, and therefore does not positively believe them; but they have impressed him; his mind is not made up about them; his judgment is in suspense, asking for a particular sort of confirmation, and that is certainly not "disbelief."

Well, but, if that is so; if other than his own experience has impressed, and rightly impressed, his mind, conviction can be logically induced by raising the same sort of evidence—the testimony of others—to a higher power. All evidence is an appeal to experience, and I can tell Mr. Watson why he has not absolutely "disbelieved" the witnesses to facts which are not in themselves conformable to his experience. It is that he has a certain positive experience of human veracity and human powers of observation. And he knows that the "cloud of witnesses" to these phenomena includes very many on whose truth and intelligence he would implicitly rely for any ordinary statement they might make. To suppose that when they make extraordinary statements their truth or their intelligence has failed, does violence to the principle of continuity in human character which is also guaranteed by experience. Now as this experience is positive, whereas what is opposed to it is mere inexperience, it is impossible that testimony of a certain quantity and quality, when fairly considered, should fail to impress the mind. I contend that the existing testimony in its entirety, if fairly considered, must not only impress, but convince the mind. But I also contend that testimony cannot be "fairly considered" by the majority of people in an age when it runs counter to dominant "preconceptions" of what is impossible or improbable in nature. Mr. Lecky, in his "History of Rationalism," has so ably illustrated this proposition that I need not dwell further on it, notwithstanding the logomachy in which Mr. Watson seeks to involve me. That "belief and unbelief are entirely outside our own volition" (so far as any conscious act of willing is meant), I quite agree; but Mr. Watson must surely see that this proposition is very distinct from another which he treats as correlative or equivalent, viz., that they are both (belief and unbelief) "the product and the measure of the force of the evidence brought to bear." When Leverrier met the testimony for meteorites with the sententious remark: "There are no stones in the sky; none, consequently, can fall upon the earth," did his "mental factor" contribute nothing to the result—his unbelief, and was the latter "the product and the measure of the evidence brought to bear"? The mental factor is not mere understanding judging with reference to experience, but is deeply dyed with the hues of prevalent opinions, hues which it mistakes for its own natural colour. Mr. Watson may, perhaps, be one of those born sceptics of whom there have been representatives in even the most credulous generations. But if not, it is no disparagement to his intelligence to say that, living 300 or 400 years ago, he would have been as apt to ascribe Maskelyne and Cooke's performances to magic as I suppose he is now to explain Eglington's slate-writing by trickery. I can credit many men with exemption from conscious prejudice, but very few with a purely objective relation to nature. But if we must bring to our judgment of testimony presumptions or "probabilities," let it be a presumption which has positive experience for a foundation. Such a presumption is at hand. I venture to quote it from an essay appended to my translation of Zollner. "If the widest and highest experience of mankind can afford us a canon of probability, it is this: that testimony, otherwise sufficient, to the exceptional, the abnormal, the strange, and the new, is probably true, and not probably false. Set side by side the cases in which newly observed facts of nature have been asserted, and have proved to be true, with the cases in which they have been well asserted, and yet disproved, or not proved, and who that is acquainted even superficially with the history of science and discovery would hesitate to say which list affords us the best foundation for an induction?" And perhaps I cannot conclude better than with the three propositions which follow what I have just quoted. (1) That testimony to the extraordinary is falsely opposed to experience. (2) That what it is opposed to is simply a negative induction from the absence of experience. (3) That a more general experience teaches us that such negative inductions cease to be probably true as soon as they are opposed to testimony of a character sufficient to establish any other fact."

PHENOMENA OF MATERIALISATION.

"Facts" is the title of a monthly pamphlet, "devoted to statements of mental and spiritual phenomena," now published at the office of the Banner of Light.

In the number (the twelfth) for December last is reprinted, from "LIGHT" of October 11th, the narrative of remarkable materialisation séances with Mr. Eglinton, by Florence Marryat. It also records some experiences of the same character at séances held under strict test conditions, minutely described.

Mr. Brackett, of Boston, reports this, Mrs. Fay being the medium: "A spirit came out in lustrous white drapery. This form dematerialised when not more than three feet from me, and eight feet from the cabinet. Then a small spot of light appeared on the carpet, gradually enlarged, heightened, and finally developed into the tall angular form of 'Auntie,' one of the medium's controls. She addressed the circle, stating the reasons for her dictating the stringent conditions under which the medium sat; and then withdrew into the cabinet. Various materialised spirits then came out successively, and were recognised by different members of the circle. 'Bertha' appeared. She extended her arms and caused to appear between them, from one hand to the other, some fine lustrous white fabric, which she let all examine; this she gracefully arranged about her, and having walked to and fro, took it off, and dematerialised it before our eyes.

"At a subsequent séance with the same medium and under the same conditions, 'Bertha' materialised flowers; another, 'Emma,' came out clad in a satin-like fabric. Mr. Whitlock had permission to cut out a piece of it, and the gap so made was rapidly filled up. A male spirit, claiming to have been a German chemist, magnetised some water for a sick lady, one of the circle; while doing so his fingers emitted fine sparkles. On my complaining he magnetised some for me, and it relieved me. Mr. Whitlock recognised a fine robust materialised spirit as his father. Our old friend, Dr. Newton, was also recognised by all present who had known him in earth-life."

To Mr. Brackett's report, Mr. Whitlock, the editor, adds a confirmatory note, to the effect that the hole which he cut in the satin-like fabric became filled up with similar material before his eyes. He adds that the circle numbered forty. He attributes the results partly to the mental harmony which prevailed among so many.

Mr. Whitlock himself reports a séance with the Misses Berry, of Boston. At this, Mr. Henry Lacroix, not long returned from a visit to France, his native country, was present. Three female spirits came out of the cabinet and talked with him in French. In answer to questions he said that they were his daughters, that there were twelve. One of the spirits said in French, "Three of fifteen, papa." He said, "True, three are still in earth-life."

The next report is by Mr. Anderson, of Salt Lake City. This séance was held in Denver, Colorado, at which he, with his family and eight others, were present; the medium was Mrs. Miller. From a temporary cabinet formed by suspended blankets, fourteen spirits came out successively, of various ages and sizes. While one spirit was with the circle, another waited at a fold of the cabinet. In the course of the séance Mr. Anderson entered it, and while talking with a spirit visible before him, put his hand upon the medium in her chair. Some of the spirits called those whom they knew to approach them. "I conversed," says Mr. Anderson, "with several. One asked me to hold her hands; while holding them she sank slowly through the floor, her hands melting in my grasp as she disappeared. This experiment was repeated by my wife, and by others, at the spirits' own suggestion. My wife was admitted into the cabinet, and continued a conversation there with a spirit, who told her that similar manifestations would before long be given in Salt Lake City.

"But," he continues, "a more remarkable manifestation was to come; a female spirit raised my little daughter in her arms and carried her about; then, still holding the child, she slowly sank, dematerialising, feet first, leaving the child where she disappeared, standing unharmed."

"The possibility," concludes Mr. Anderson, "of such manifestations implies favourable conditions, among which must be considered the perfect harmony of the circle. But I must not omit a noteworthy incident: A spirit-child came out of the cabinet and was recognised by ex-Judge Cassidy, of Denver, as his granddaughter. He spoke to her, but she said she wanted to talk to Gracie. The only one present answering to that name was my little daughter; they became at once familiar, and went together into the cabinet, prattling to one another just like two mortal little girls. Our Gracie returned to us, but the other remained in the cabinet, to vanish, with the rest of our strange visitors, into the air from which they seemed—to our mortal sight—all to have come!"

AN APPARITION CONNECTED WITH THE BATTLE OF BLENHEIM, AS QUOTED BY MISS STRICKLAND.

Meagre as the following record is, from its connection with the great victory of Blenheim, and the interest which naturally attaches to the freethinking Sophia, Electress of Hanover, mother of George I., in whose letter to her friend Leibnitz, the great German savant, it occurs, it may prove of interest to the readers of "LIGHT," and perhaps incite to further research among those fortunate enough to have access to the valuable record quoted by Miss Strickland in her "Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses," Vol. VIII, pages 390, 391, from which I copy the account (or rather allusion) verbatim.

"All Europe now rang with the fame of the Marlborough victories; the war through the year 1704 had become gigantic. Brunswick troops had partaken in the great victory of Blenheim, which occurred in the succeeding year, where Sophia's third son, Duke Max, commanded the Emperor's left wing.

"Of course, the victorious Marlborough and his captains were received as welcome guests at her Court. But before their arrival she thus wrote to her confident Leibnitz: 'I know not if the Landrost Busch has confided to Laxbourg the revelation he had from his son who was killed there; he appeared to him and prayed him not to be afflicted at his death, because he was very happy.' I find this very extraordinary, to have known of the battle so positively. The Elector says, above all, 'What judgment will M. Leibnitz pass on this subject?'"

After quoting the above letter, Miss Strickland continues:—"A very curious question it is as propounded by the philosophic Electress to her high priest in those matters. The three persons concerned in the discussion of the above ghost story—the Electress Sophia, her son George I., and the German Newton Leibnitz—had each their different opinions. The Elector (George I.) believed implicitly in ghosts, vampires, and all the diablerie to which his countrymen seriously incline. He suffered superstitious notions to guide him in his course of conduct, and, if we may believe his contemporaries, lost his life through the sudden shock of a summons to the tribunal of God, sent by his injured wife from her deathbed. He did not receive it till six months afterwards, travelling to Osnaburg. He was in good health, but being suddenly shocked by reading it he never spoke after. The letter was in his carriage when he was taken out dead.

"Sophia, it may be seen, although she mentions the apparition of the young Blenheim soldier in the briefest words, is startled fairly out of her infidelity. 'For Busch,' she says, 'knew the death of his son so positively,' her meaning being before any intelligence of this world could have brought it."

In another note Miss Strickland adds:—"George II. fancied he had seen vampires, and has left a judicial account of these supernaturals. The trial, happening when he was at Trieste, is quoted by Lord Byron, on whom it made a strong impression."

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXIX.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

What has been said in these pages of the value of the testimony to the facts of Spiritualism, given by Mr. Barkas, of Newcastle, is not a bit overdrawn. I have seen him in his house, with his scientific work in astronomy and geology around him—a solid, useful man, full of common-sense and pure logic. Mr. Cowan, his townsman, a man of great vigour and influence, quite knew what he was about when he left the House of Commons to take the chair at Mr. Barkas's lecture, some time ago, in London.

"A good name is," in many cases, "a tower of strength." Let me make a suggestion. Let us get the matter of one of the standing pages of "LIGHT"—the testimonies to the reality of spiritual manifestation—neatly printed as a tract and widely circulated among the still ignorant, and perhaps therefore intolerant, friends of Spiritualists.

Mr. E. A. Brackett, in a recent number of the Banner of Light, describes a materialising séance, in which, while standing near to, and talking with the medium, he saw, shook hands, and conversed with several of his perfectly recognised friends in the spirit world. He says: "As I gazed with delight upon this sudden and unexpected manifestation, bathed in a mellow light which made all the surroundings perfectly visible, I could not help feeling a regret that my psychical friends had shut themselves out from such evidence, by presenting arrangements to which no intelligent control would submit. Here, under strictly test-conditions, which precluded any possible doubt, was crowded into a small space just the information which I am sure that some of them are honestly endeavouring to obtain." Well, the next thing to personal observation of such transcendent facts is a good account of them by reliable, entirely credible, witnesses. Not to believe any senses but our own is to ignore nearly the whole of science. To reject good testimony is the end of a great part of knowledge. We transfer property, and imprison, and even hang, our fellow men upon testimony. Is it not strange, then, that the evidence for Spiritualism, often far stronger than that upon which we deliberately strangle a fellow creature and give another inhabitant to the world of spirits, is rejected?

And Spiritualism raises anew the question whether we have any right to shoot our rubbish by gallows or gunpowder into that other world. Considering that forty millions of souls manage to leave their earthly bodies every year, the few thousands of soldiers shot or murderers hanged can make but little difference.

But the fact, at last demonstrated, that the human spirit survives its body, and the probability that millions of worlds have been inhabited for millions of years by beings whose souls survive their bodies, so that infinite space may have an all but infinite number of spirits—"must give us pause." The mind expands with what it feeds upon, and necessarily bursts all the bonds by which it has been confined.

The material universe, of which we get slight glimpses in the starry heavens, orders itself by the two forces of attraction and repulsion. It is reasonable to presume some analogy in the forces which govern the spiritual universe. What "outlook" we may have must come from our explorations. All our analogies must be drawn from our facts—and they who ignore or deny the facts can have no insight and no outlook.

I read in the Christian World, "Mr. Maskelyne says, dark séances are wicked, and that fathers and husbands have complained to him of the insults put upon their wives and daughters during the hour of darkness; and that the Spiritualists trade and fatten on this use of the dark séance."

Of course, all the fathers and husbands of Spiritualist women rush off to complain to Mr. Maskelyne, who for years has packed as many men and women as he could get into the Egyptian Hall and then turned off the lights and given his dark séances, at which people behave with the most exemplary propriety, and of which wives and daughters never complain. And what of the magic lanterns, dissolving views, in all the lecture halls of London and the provinces? Really, the Christian World is not consistent!

The Newcastle Chronicle, Mr. Cowan's paper, gives a good account of some physical manifestations. The writer says: "We all placed the tips of our fingers only on the table. One of the sitters asked that the table should be lifted, if the spirit-friends could do so. After being rapidly rocked to and fro a few times it gradually rose some three feet from the floor, and lowered. Next the 'control' was desired to lift it again higher, and this was done, the table rising so high that we had to stand up in order to reach it. And being elevated about six feet, it was put gently down again, but not in the exact spot where it had stood before. A request being made that it should be put in its proper place, this was at once done."

I hear that Mr. W. Eglinton has received a most flattering and advantageous offer to visit Australia, and that it is within the region of possibility that he may leave our shores for the Antipodes in the autumn. Many attempts have been made at various times to induce him to pay the Australian Colonies a visit, but his engagements have always prevented his doing so. Much as his departure from our shores would be, as I consider, an irreparable loss to the cause of Spiritualism in this country, no doubt a more useful work is to be done in the Colonies in breaking new ground.

Mr. Eglinton is truly a missionary. After having been in almost every country in Europe, he is now going to put a girder round the world, and so complete his experience; but not in time, I fear, to include it in "Twixt Two Worlds," which, I am glad to hear, is now about to appear.

During Mr. Eglinton's recent visit to the Continent he met, amongst others, the eminent French Society artist, M. Tissot, whose attention was first attracted to Spiritualism through reading Florence Marryat's account of a materialisation published some months since in the columns of this journal. M. Tissot seized the opportunity of Mr. Eglinton's tour abroad to commence a practical investigation of the subject, and so interested did he become in what occurred that he has recently paid a visit to London for the express purpose of continuing his inquiry. After searching investigation he has expressed himself as thoroughly convinced of the reality of spiritual phenomena. His experience both in psychography and materialisation, especially the latter, was certainly most marvellous, one form which appeared having been indubitably recognised by him as that of a deceased friend.

Apocryphal of materialisation, a sensation is likely to be caused in society and the artistic world by the next picture from M. Tissot's pencil. I am violating no confidence by stating that I have seen a sketch which M. Tissot intends to issue as a mezzotint. The subject is a materialisation as seen and drawn by the artist on the spot, and it needs no assertion of mine to show that a picture like this from the hand of a master is likely to prove one of the pictures of the year.

A CONTRAST: HOW THE TRUTH IS ADVANCING.—In an article on apparitions in the "National Encyclopedia," published from fifteen to twenty years since, occurs the following passage: "We cannot dismiss the subject of apparitions without observing that the manner in which these phantoms have vanished before the light of knowledge affords a striking illustration of the blessings which descend even to the lowest of the people from the diffusion of the sound principles of philosophy." An article on the same subject by "A.Z." in the last edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" says: "Apparitions in the ordinary acceptance of the word can scarcely be better defined than in the words used by Defoe: 'They are the invisible inhabitants of the unknown world, affecting human shapes, or any shapes, and showing themselves visibly to us.' 'We shall probably,' adds the writer on his own account, 'arrive at the conclusion that there is in this subject either some substratum of unexplained facts, or that the human imagination is subject to laws which have not been sufficiently investigated.'"

INQUIRERS AND INQUIRIES.

By "M.A. (OXON)."

No. II.

In a previous paper on this subject I had given some reasons for my belief that the undoubted difficulties of some inquirers were inevitable and to be expected. For we are making an excursion into an unknown country, and it is not reasonable to ask us too minutely as to its internal economy, or even as to its geography and topography. Some of us on first landing did impulsively give some information derived from some people that we chanced to meet; but we are now, perhaps (the wisest of us), sorry that we spoke unadvisedly. We know some things; we deduce from them other things as probable; we generalise and surmise more; but we have no map of the country, and are in no wise ashamed to confess that our knowledge is extremely limited.

Moreover, the avenues of knowledge are so various that only very few of us can estimate the value of the information that comes through each. It is one of the most remarkable facts about a remarkable age that the attempt on the part of the world of spirit to get into relations with and influence our world should be so widespread. It is not by any means confined to that particular spiritual outbreak with which I am concerned. Since it broke out in America less than forty years ago, we have had definite attempts on the part of spirit to correlate itself with us, such as that which found a mouthpiece in Thomas Lake Harris; or that which is associated for all time on the Continent of Europe with the name of Allan Kardec. We have had in the United States of America more than I can remember or name. We have had Eastern philosophy adapted to Western thought by what claims to be occult agency, drawing its information from a high spiritual source; and, not to particularise too minutely, we have lately had a spiritual revelation, not without its own truth and beauty, from the slopes of Mount Carmel, even as we have had (what has at any rate acted as flint to our steel in eliciting a spark of thought) a very different one from the slopes of the Himalayas.

All more or less stuff? Quite so: or, as I prefer to put it, all embodiments of partial truth: no monopoly of perfection in any of them: no approach even to more than a mere adumbration of truth such as the several minds who received the several revelations were able to bear. We all have our little mug, and we can't do more than fill it. We do not all go to the same streamlet, but all the streamlets trickle down to us from the great Fount, losing something by the way, acquiring some contamination, but conveniently adapted by locality to various needs. It must be so. If you, my good friend, had been born on the banks of the Ganges, locality would have influenced the unconscious choice of the spiritual streamlet at which your soul first slaked its thirst (if it had any); as it is, you were born on the banks of the Thames, and things are different.

This has been so in all ages. The avenues of spiritual enlightenment are various, and are adapted to very various needs. This is so now, and has been so always. And observe that it has not been from a common centre that all these various local centres of activity have been thrown off. We can tell nothing (for we have not the materials for judgment) about what took place when that great spiritual wave passed over us which left us the holy influence of the Christ, the most pure as it has been the most beneficent that the world has ever seen. But we can watch the present outpouring of the Spirit, and we can see that it is not a mundane development from a central spot on our earth. It is not in one place but in many, scattered sporadically over the face of the world; not to one type of mind or to one sphere of thought that Spirit has manifested itself; but to all who have ears to hear and the power to assimilate the message. It was said in the old days—if I may reverently apply what is a truth for all time, of no local or special application—"The wind bloweth where it listeth... so is every one that is born of the Spirit." We can give no reason for these sudden outbursts of Spirit power in special places; we cannot tell why one is taken and intromitted into the inner mysteries of the kingdom of Spirit (which in a very real sense may be, and often is, a Kingdom of Heaven), while another strives in vain to get evidence which would, if he got it, be no proof to him, and which he has not imagination enough to grasp (for spiritual things are spiritually discerned), except that the origin of all is not with us, not governed by our wishes, or moulded to our ideas of fitness.

We only know that it is so; and so long as it is we shall not be able to answer questions and objections which would be suitable if concerned with exact science, but which are not in place when we are but on the threshold of spiritual mysteries. Rather than vex ourselves with these too curious questionings let us think what has already been done for us in the leavoning of religious thought, in the buttressing of a yielding faith, in the demonstration of intelligence apart from a human brain, in the establishment of a sure and certain hope that because life and activity are possible for some of the disembodied members of our race, and that demonstrably, they are possible also for us.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

DEAR SIR,—Will you permit me a little space in your paper to say to the members of this Alliance that the Council feel it desirable to make some arrangement by which our members may be enabled to communicate with one another and with the members of the Council personally.

They propose that some of the Council shall attend at 16, Craven-street, every Tuesday evening during the month of June, from six to eight o'clock; and they will be pleased if members will take that opportunity to visit them informally for any purpose that they may desire. This will be an experiment which they trust will lead to more active work.

Yours obediently,

MORELL THEOBALD,

16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, Hon. Sec.
May 26th, 1885.

MR. G. S. DARTER, an old Spiritualist, of Cape Town, South Africa, is now in London, and intends to make a tour on the Continent soon after the approaching marriage of his daughter. He would be glad if any one will inform him of the address of Mr. J. H. Herbst. Mr. Darter reports the cause to be in a flourishing condition in South Africa.

Transitions.

VICTOR HUGO.

A man of massive genius has been removed from the world, and we are the poorer for the loss of Victor Hugo. It is not always possible to admire his many poses, nor to follow with approval all his erratic utterances. He was a man of contradictions; a fierce hater, tumultuous in his denunciations; a lover of children, and a sympathising friend to the poor and needy. He has desired that his body may be laid to rest in the republican simplicity that his soul loved, and that no formal utterances of prayer or panegyric may break the solemn silence of the tomb. It has been the fashion, from some passages in his writings, and from some impetuous utterances of his during his life, to regard Victor Hugo as an Atheist. This feeling will gather force from his last wish respecting his funeral. Yet it was not true of him that he denied the existence of a God; on the contrary, he died affirming that belief. Nor did he make light of that true and pure religion which alone could touch his simplicity and sincerity of nature. He only desired to avoid a histrionic display, and perhaps to mark his dissent from an elaborate system of dogmatic theology to which he was unable to assent. His views nowhere find a clearer expression than in the following words which closed his oration over the grave of Madame Paul Meurice some years ago:—

"From her heights of serenity in the unknown world, she will see around her these hearts of ours which are still full of her, these friends who respect and glorify her, this good husband who mourns her. The memory of her, at once sad and charming, will never be effaced. It will illumine the twilight in which we live. May the eternal spirit receive into its high domain that immortal spirit of hers! Life is the problem; death, the solution. I repeat it, and it is this with which I desire to end my adieu; the tomb is neither dark nor void; no, it is a great light, and may he who now speaks to you be enabled to turn to that light! For the man who exists no longer, as it were, here below, for the man whose only ambition is contained in death, it is reserved to see in the depth of infinity, in the sublime and dazzling brightness of the grave, the fixed star of God."

However strong may have been the objection felt by M. Hugo to dogmatic theology, he has struck in those burning words the key-note of true religious faith and aspiration, and must be claimed, by virtue of them, as a good Spiritualist.

"M. A. (OXON)."

LISETTE MAKDOUGALL GREGORY.

It is with extreme regret that we have to record the passing away of Mrs. Makdougall Gregory, at her residence, 21, Green-street, W., on Sunday last. She died a sudden and painless death from breaking a blood vessel. She had been ill, but was, apparently, as nearly recovered as a lady of her advanced age could expect. She would have been eighty next August. There are few Spiritualists who do not owe Mrs. Gregory a debt of gratitude for the facilities for the investigation of Spiritualism which she unwearingly, from the early days of the movement, placed at the disposal of her friends and acquaintances. The news of her transition comes too late to enable us to deal exhaustively with her work for Spiritualism. The subjoined extract from the preface to the second edition of "Animal Magnetism," written in 1877, gives a few particulars, and pending the publication next week of a more extended memoir, we can only say that in her departure from the physical plane, Spiritualism, Spiritualists, and mediums especially, have lost a devoted friend and helper. The funeral takes place at Brompton on Friday next.

Mrs. Gregory's maiden name was Lisette Scott; she was daughter of John Scott the Younger, of Gala, who was the son of Sir George Makdougall and Ann Makdougall, daughter and heiress of the ancient family of Makerstoun, established in Roxburghshire since A.D. 1100.

Mrs. Makdougall Gregory was as deeply interested in psychological science as her partner; indeed, it is well known that up to the present time she continues to work arduously in London, doing all she can to disseminate a knowledge of this interesting science. Professor and Mrs. Gregory were both well acquainted with Harriet Martineau, who wished Professor Gregory to write her biography, and offered to send all the documents and letters necessary for the purpose. He was unable, in the midst of other arduous duties, to undertake the additional responsible work. Professor Gregory's works on chemistry, especially the organic branch of that subject, are even now valuable text books to the student, although it is a science in which such rapid advances are made from day to day.

MRS. LOFTUS OTWAY.

We regret to announce the passing away of Mrs. Georgina Frances Otway, on Tuesday, the 19th inst. The deceased lady had been a Spiritualist for many years past, and always helped any scheme likely to promote the interest of Spiritualism, but of late she took no active part in the movement, probably owing to the death of her son, Captain Cecil Otway, which took place last autumn, and from which she never recovered. Mrs. Otway was the sole heiress of General Sir Loftus William Otway, and married in 1837, Captain Marjoribanks Hughes, who assumed the surname of Otway in lieu of his patronymic, and who survives her. She leaves three sons and two daughters, and will be mourned by a large circle of acquaintances, no less for her endearing qualities than for her kindness and consideration to the poor, to whom she was at all times a generous donor. The belief she held so strongly is now exchanged for knowledge.

T. C. CAUDLE asks for a brief definition of the nature and efficacy of prayer as believed in by modern Spiritualists. By prayer a magnetic rapport is established between him who prays and ministering spirits, bringing to the former a rich spiritual blessing. "The very cry of the burdened soul is in itself an unknown relief. The spirit is lightened though the prayer is not granted in the terms of the petition. By the rapport thus established guardian angels are able to pour into the sorrow-laden soul the value of sympathy. From them comes that peace which at such times steals over the soul and assures it of a sympathising and consoling God. The prayer does its work by drawing down an angel friend." But the answer to prayer is subject to law; therefore, prayer for rain or for its cessation is obviously inconsistent. For further teaching read Crowell's "Primitive Christianity and Modern Spiritualism," also "Spirit Teachings," by "M.A. (OXON.)."

WANTED a copy of Justinus Kerner's "Seeress of Prevorst" in the original German. State price to Editor of "LIGHT."

FROM inquiries which are repeatedly made, it does not appear to be generally known that Mr. W. Eglinton has returned from the Continent, and may now be seen or addressed at 6, Nottingham-place, W. Several investigators who have had sances with him recently testify to the remarkable nature of his powers. There are few who visit him who do not receive complete satisfactory evidence of the genuineness of psychography.

ENVY is fixed only on merit, and, like a sore eye, is offended with everything that is bright.

POETRY, like truth, is a common flower. God has sown it over the earth like the daisies, sprinkled with tears, or glowing in the sun; even as He places the crocus and the March frosts together, and beautifully mingles life and death.

PLATE IV.—BEST OF JOHN KING.

A curious feature connected with materialisations (and I believe also with transformations) generally, but in "John King's" apparitions especially, is the perceptible variation in height and size of the form. The same peculiarity is noticeable in the busts. The total height of "John's" form nearly always exceeds that of the medium. I have found, by actual measurement that, at times, there was a difference of as many as six or seven inches. Like most other "spirit forms" which vary in size, the type is unchanged, and as far as the face is concerned, it may be either small or large, pale or robust; but the portrait is ever that of the familiar "John King." Yet, the expression of his eyes is subjected to slight variations according to circumstances, the most important of which being the medium's condition of health. The length and thickness of the beard also frequently show a marked divergency from the usual type. But what seems most perplexing is, that in cases when the "form manifestation" is an undoubted transfiguration of the medium's person, the individual type of "John" is preserved in all its details. His powerful voice is invariably the same whenever heard. It may be heard in spots where the solid form could not possibly locate itself, as, for instance, against the ceiling, underneath the table, over the floor behind the piano (other voices are sometimes heard inside this instrument, or inside the chimney, &c.). I have personally convinced myself—often by direct experiment—that "John's" voice travels all over the room whilst the medium is seated at the table, hands being joined all round.

I must here observe that on such occasions, when the medium has been removed (i.e., by spirits through levitation) into another room, I do not consider any "form" to be a true materialisation unless other direct and unimpeachable evidence establishes such a fact; that, therefore, all the more remarkable cases and phenomena I have quoted were presented with the medium amongst us, both his hands being held by responsible and reliable inquirers. Phenomena witnessed under conditions which might be looked upon as unsatisfactory, manifestations only partly observed, or of a doubtful nature, or such as could, by confederacy, be easily imitated, I do not intend to describe. But, at the same time, I am constrained to confess that many of these spiritual "miracles" at first evoked grave suspicions in my mind, but which now, after repeated observations, I consider to be plain and incontestable realities, of which every patient investigator may convince himself.

I will now refer to some phenomena witnessed when the medium had been removed in a manner as before stated, and which I cannot but consider as affording the most satisfactory evidence of their genuineness. I confine my remarks to certain feats performed by "John King." One evening, "John" informed the circle that it would be better for the medium to be seated in the corner of the room; the latter, having just recovered from a short trance, was advised by his instructor to arrange himself comfortably and obtain a light. I, thereupon, and without a moment's delay, struck a match, when, to our astonishment, we found all the "spirits" gone; and there must have been several, considering the different voices that were, two seconds previous, heard all over the room. The medium had now taken a seat, as advised by "John," the match by this time having burnt out. Suddenly a spirit-light appeared from the new corner, and "John" stood before us carrying the large disc-shaped light before his face. As he approached me I noticed his nude arms, and by the reflection of this light on the wall was enabled to observe the complete outline of a male form, only thinly covered by drapery, the time occupied by the "spirit" in materialising being no more than ten seconds. I merely quote this as one instance out of very many to point to the impossibility of the medium performing a spirit apparition, because he was dressed in his usual costume, and ten seconds later, the spirit appeared showing a nude form through the thin material covering it. I do not think it possible for any person dressed in the usual attire, to divest himself of all his garments, re-dress in spirit costume, procure an artificially compounded light, and all this in ten seconds of time. With clothing constructed for the purpose, like the Protean costumes worn by the clown, or on the stage, such a feat could be performed even more rapidly, but the ordinary costume, like that habitually worn by the medium, would be a very serious encumbrance. Still, I merely quote the occurrence and the circumstances under which it took place for what it may be worth, giving it only as my personal opinion that it has all the appearance of a genuine spirit-manifestation. Nor would the suggestion of a confederate hidden in the back parlour account for much, because similar instantaneous apparitions have been witnessed by competent observers at seances held with Husk, in private circles. I will now give a list of the peculiar traits of both "John King" and his medium. The spirit, when materialised or when appearing in the transformed medium's body, presents the following characteristics: Height, about six feet; hands, large, broad and fleshy; head, of average size; nose, slightly curved, but the bridge perfectly symmetrical; mouth, small; teeth, small; eyes, small and decidedly normal, as far as the power of sight is concerned; cheeks, rather full; skin, pale and smooth; eyebrows, nearly straight and well divided; black beard and moustache. The medium's height appears to vary, at least to have undergone a slight reduction during the manifestations. I find that after a seance, probably on account of some loss of vitality necessary to produce the various phenomena, his body has shrunk about two inches. If I am not mistaken, the reduction of the stature of the human frame consequent upon bodily fatigue, long-continued walking, &c., is a well-known fact. Anyhow, the medium is, as a rule, shorter in stature than the manifesting "spirit" of "John King" (and decidedly shorter than another of his familiar "spirits" materialising more or less regularly, whose height at times exceeds eight feet). Husk's hands are broad, but bony, and the skin is coarse and shrivelled, resembling those of a very aged person. The head is under average size, nose curved, but irregular at the bridge, there being a slight unevenness or twist towards the left side. His mouth is larger than "John King's," and the teeth are bigger. The eyes of the medium, in consequence of an unfortunate affliction, are almost devoid of expression—in fact, I need not repeat what every investigator personally acquainted with Husk already knows, namely, that he is nearly blind. The cheek bones are high but the cheeks lean, the flesh of normal colour and the skin rather rough, eyebrows curved and nearly touching; no beard.

AUSTRALIA.—The Victorian Association of Spiritualists at Melbourne celebrated the thirty-seventh anniversary of the advent of modern Spiritualism. The proceedings were held in one of the largest halls in the city: they included literary, musical, and choreographic assemblies. There was on view a large collection of direct spirit-writings, drawings and pencilings, writings through automatic mediums, spirit photographs, and paraffin moulds.—Le Messenger.

PSYCHOMETRY.

By T. L. NICHOLS, M.D.

I have just received a pleasant letter from one of the most eminent of American Spiritualists, Dr. J. R. Buchanan, author of works on medicine, education, and Spiritualism, with allied phenomena. Not long ago Dr. Buchanan had the good fortune to marry a highly gifted lady, well known as a psychometric. The learned Doctor writes: "I gave your name to Mrs. Buchanan at our dinner just now for an offhand psychometric description, which she gave in these words: 'An able writer, sound and logical, impassional, living. He could write sensibly on various themes—not a man of fancies, but sound. He is not in this country—far away. His views are similar to yours. He would read your books with interest and approve them. His writings would be on his profession, and the condition of the world and promotion of health and education.' ('What is his age?') 'Very nearly as old as you. He has good health unimpaired, and, with his good care, should live long. His ideas are all reformatory, and he has a following. Those who know him like him.' ('What family?') 'He has no wife—he is a widower.'"

Now how did Mrs. Buchanan, who certainly never saw, and probably never heard of me, get all that information? Brain reading? Not her husband's, for Dr. Buchanan never saw me and probably knows very little about me. He adds: "You will have a good record to remember in the upper world, where we shall meet before many years. I am hurrying to get out 'Psychometry,' then I have to prepare a mind volume, also 'Electro-therapeutics' and 'Anthropology.' If I could live to 120 years I might achieve my plans, but I can only do an unfinished work."

I had, many years ago, another remarkable experience of the psychometric faculty. A friend of mine sealed up a business letter from me in a blank envelope, and handed it to a lady who had never seen, and probably never heard of me—a sister of the late William Denton, who died while exploring New Guinea. She held the packet in her hands, then against her forehead, and gave him as good a description of me as if she had known me most intimately for twenty years, extending to particulars of my physical condition known only to myself, when the letter was written.

How did she get this knowledge, some 200 miles away? Not from my friend who gave her the letter, for he had no such knowledge to give. Well, perhaps this is not Spiritualism; but such facts surely illustrate spiritual powers and possibilities. I know a lady who used to get the matter of a letter, and sometimes an image of the writer, if a stranger, so that she recognised him when she saw him, before she opened the envelope.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

A paper on the present revival of Mysticism was read by Mr. Edward Maitland before this Society on the 20th inst.

This revival, he said, is at once the most remarkable and most important of all the notes of our era, both for its power to interpret the past and to influence the future. Mysticism is the science and philosophy of Spirit, and refers to processes and conditions occurring within the soul. It thus denotes transcendental metaphysics. Occultism, on the contrary, denotes transcendental physics, and refers to a sphere exterior to the soul, that, namely, in which the soul is. The one is concerned with spirit, the other with spirits. Mysticism is the product of the spiritual consciousness, which is the consciousness of the innermost and highest region in man; and the faculty by which this region is cognised is the intuition, or centripetal mode of the mind, whereby man obtains access to the knowledge which, in the long ages of its past, the soul has gathered by experience concerning God and the Universe. As the world had lost its spiritual consciousness, and denied the soul and the intuition, the revival of Mysticism implies a twofold recovery—of faculty and of knowledge.

All sacred scriptures and true religions have been products of the spiritual consciousness. Wherefore the revival of Mysticism means the interpretation of these by their proper authors—the mystics. And as their significance is entirely spiritual—religion being addressed to the soul—it means also the transference of this from the physical to the spiritual plane. The world's spiritual history is marked by a series of corresponding revivals, alike in the East and the West. In the East they are called Avatars, in the West, Messianic advents and illuminations. In both worlds the series consists of ten such events, each of them making a cycle, or day, in man's spiritual creation, of which the duration is about 600 years, the great cycle which is made up of these representing the entire evolution of the spiritual consciousness of the races concerned. The earlier steps of this great ladder are traceable in Biblical and other prehistoric myths and legends. The latter are recorded in history. Throughout them all runs one definite purpose—the recognition by, and establishment in, the world of a system of thought which at once explains the nature of existence; and provides for the conduct of it a rule by the observance of which man may turn his own existence to the utmost possible account in the long run by making of himself the best that he has in him to be.

Such a system it is which has found expression in all true Bible and religions, and of which the great religious systems of East and West have been the vehicles. Known in the West as the Hermetic Gnosis, it was originally the product of Divine revelation, and is always discerned afresh whenever men recover in sufficient degree the faculty by which it was originally received—the intuition, the possession of which makes the mystic. Mystically regarded, the Bible represents the fall of man as consisting in the obscuration of the spiritual consciousness through the soul's descent into matter, or fall beneath the power of the bodily consciousness. Such is the primary meaning of the allegory of the creation, the soul being symbolised as a woman, and in this stage called Eve, and the bodily consciousness as a man, and called Adam. In its secondary and historical sense, this allegory may be taken as denoting the first formulation of the Hermetic Gnosis and institution of that Church of Christ which consists of those—and those only—who possess the spiritual consciousness. Both this, and each of the events described under the histories of Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Ezra, and Christ, are readily interpretable as implying progressive restorations of this consciousness, or "revivals of Mysticism." "Christ" would thus represent the "Seventh from Adam" of these cycles; but a "Second Coming" was necessary for the full comprehension of the Christ-idea by the world. The eighth cycle, A.D. 700 to 1,300, saw the permeation of Christendom by the doctrine, at once Hermetic and Christian, formulated under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite, and the acceptance by both the Eastern and Western Churches of the mystical presentation of Christianity.

The ninth cycle—A.D. 1,300 to the present time—witnessed another great advance in the same direction in the rise of the "Scholastic Philosophy,"—a movement largely contributed to by the Arabian school of Mysticism, which under the Mohammedan régime had meanwhile attained a notable development—the Hermetic doctrine of Dionysius receiving everywhere the fullest recognition as constituting the esoteric truth, not only of Christianity, but of religion itself. The illumination of this cycle—which was at the time regarded as a Messianic advent, and like the present one had been predicted as such—was followed, like all the rest, by an obscuration, or "fall," of the spiritual consciousness, through the usual cause—the materialistic and idolatrous tendencies of the priesthood. And it is the restoration from this fall that is immediately represented by the present revival of Mysticism.

The significant characteristics of these events—the true character and mutual relation of which, if not the very existence of the series constituted by them, are now being indicated for the first time—are (1) the recovery or promulgation of a doctrine either secret, forgotten, or lost. (2) The identity in all cases of this doctrine. (3) Its Hermetic character. (4) The regular periodicity of its recurrence; and (5) the identity of the method of its recovery, as related of all those who have been instrumental in it, whether in the past or the present—namely, by means of intuitional perception and recollection.

Conspicuous among the numerous tokens of the influence now once more operative in the world to the same end, are that remarkable and otherwise inexplicable phenomenon, modern Spiritualism, which, however, belongs to Occultism rather than to Mysticism; and the action taken by the present Pope in regard to Catholic education. For in restoring, as he has done, the teaching of Aquinas to be henceforth the basis of ecclesiastical education, he is ministering directly—whether consciously or not—to the establishment of the mystical and Hermetic system of interpretation; as distinguished from the historical and sacerdotal, and therein to that which it is the chief aim of this Society to promote—namely, the final establishment of religion upon its proper "Rock," the Understanding.

The paper concluded by a summary of the doctrines of the Religion of the Future as thus foreshadowed, and was followed by the usual conversational discussion.

* For a fuller account of this method of interpretation see "The Perfect Way" and "How the World came to an End in 1881."

* A few sets of these chromo drawings still remain, and may be obtained of Manager of the Psychological Press, 4, Ave. Maria-lane, E.C., price 2s. 6d., the set, packed on roller for safe transmission by parcel post.—SEE ADVT.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MRS. RICHMOND'S INSPIRATIONAL DISCOURSES.—Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond delivered her second discourse of the present season, the subject being "The Soul of Man, and its Immortal Destiny," at the Town Hall, Kensington, on Sunday evening last, to an appreciative audience. Many who arrived late were not able to obtain admission, the hall being full. It was stated that there could be no higher theme for human contemplation, no thought so absorbing and all engrossing to the mind of man, as the contemplation of immortality. This inquiry has interested men in all ages, and its very existence is an evidence of the reality of immortality. Materialists say that even matter is eternal. How much more, then, should it be said that that which comprehends and analyses matter is eternal? The expression of the soul may change, but change is not death; change is life, and the changing forms of being expressed by nature illustrate that life is eternal. The seed was something before it became a seed; the blossom is not all that there is of being in its own existence. It proceeds from the bud, goes on to fruition, again to be carried forward to manifold expressions of life. The very laws of physical phenomena point to immortality, to a living intelligence controlling them, to a something more than a mere combination of atoms. God builds the outward structure of the material universe, and the soul, though finite in its capacity but endowed with the attributes of Deity, builds the outward structure of the body for its habitation, its experience, and its expressions. The soul wears the semblance of the Divine, and introduces into human existence the elements of love, faith, hope, and prophecy. The soul, manifesting itself as eternal in its power and possession, is only here transiently, occupying for a time this tenement of clay, using perfectly or imperfectly the physical organism, to the end that each individual consciousness may become aware of its immortal nature even while on earth. After the discourse, an impromptu poem was given on "The Death of General Gordon," being the subject chosen by the audience. It was announced that the discourse on Sunday evening next, the 31st inst., would be on "The Soul, Spirit, and Mind of Man: their Nature and Destiny."

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS, 43, MANOR-PLACE, WALWORTH-ROAD.—Mr. Robson being unwell, and not able to attend, Mr. James Veitch took his place, and delivered a lecture on "Ancient and Modern Spiritualism," on Sunday evening last. Spiritualism, i.e., the knowledge of, in contradistinction to the belief in, immortality, he contended, existed amongst the various nations of the ancient world. Grecian history, as testified by Herodotus, was full of interventions on the part of disembodied beings. The Delphic oracles, the demon or spirit guide of Socrates, could be explained on no other ground. Numerous instances were given from the history of other nations to show its connection with modern Spiritualism. On Sunday next Mr. James Veitch will speak on "Faith Healing."

GLASGOW.—Spiritualists' Hall, 2, Carlton-place, Sunday, 17th May.—On this occasion the instructors of Mrs. Wallis discoursed on "The Mission and Teachings of Jesus," to an attentive and appreciative audience.—On Sunday, 24th inst., the instructors of Mr. E. W. Wallis replied to a printed sermon by the Rev. Dr. De Witt Talmage on the question: "Is there a Hell?" The subject attracted a crowd of strangers, and the hall was well filled. The guides were very vigorous, and successful in handling the subject.—On Tuesday, 26th inst., at eight o'clock, a meeting was held under the auspices of the "Fraternal Discussion Union," a recently instituted adjunct to the Society, when a paper was read by Mr. Munro bearing on the favourite dictum of optimism, "Whatever is, is right." A keen but friendly discussion followed.—On Sunday, 31st inst., it is intended to have a Floral Service at the hall in commemoration of the passing into spirit life of one of the Society's members, Mr. Urquhart. This event happened some ten days ago, suddenly; and much sympathy is naturally felt, not only for the departed, but for those whom he has left behind. The members have been appealed to in support of this project, which, if carried out in the way suggested, is calculated to effect a good impression of the views of Spiritualists concerning death and the life hereafter. It is expected the guides of both Mr. and Mrs. Wallis will take part in the proceedings. Next week's notes will report the service when it shall have transpired. The subject of discourse for the occasion will be: "Social States in Spirit Life," by Mr. Wallis's guides.—ST. MURDO.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Frische, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Barton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Cathness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1883), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Naylor, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulae is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thought; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science. These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful! (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

MENTAL HEALING IN BOSTON, U.S.A.

By "M.A. (Oxox)."

From time to time, during some years, I have noticed in this journal, and in other places, cases of the alleged cure of disease by methods other than those of orthodox medical science. Many such cures are recorded; some produced by mesmeric treatment, some following on prayer, some resulting from an act of faith, some caused by the conscious exercise of will on the part of a strongly magnetic person, some claimed as the effect of spirit-agency acting through a human instrument. In all these cases, except the first and last, the efficient cause of healing is the mind, whether of the patient cured, or of the physician who cures. And it is impossible to deny that there is a large body of evidence, which would be good and sufficient to establish any ordinary fact, that remarkable cures have been thus effected. I do not speak of mere nervous ailments, which might be expected to be soothed and even removed by magnetic treatment, but of the healing of organic disease, and of the removal of ailments which are certainly not attributable to a hysterical imagination or a perverted fancy. Nor is there anything in all this which an enlightened physician, who is also a student of psychical science, should put aside as unacceptable. For he knows well, by daily experience, that his success in treating a particular case depends largely upon the degree in which he possesses the confidence of his patient. Complete harmony of mind between the healer and the healed is a more potent factor in the cure than most persons are prepared to admit. And when this mental sympathy is further aided by the union of a powerful will with a magnetic presence on the part of the physician, and a passive patience combined with an active faith on the part of the sick man, we have the elements of a cure ready to hand without further search.

This truth has been recognised and acted upon by various persons who have professed to cure disease without recourse to drugs. Just now Boston (U.S.A.) is convulsed with excitement caused by "mind-cures" or "mental healing." Any such furor runs its course in America with startling vigour. "The Judæa of Spiritualism" is very receptive of spiritual excitement, come in what form it may; and just now the Bostonians have got this particular form of excitement in a highly developed form. The science of mental healing has taken so firm a hold on minds the most intelligent and cultured—for it need not be said, that the "hub of the universe" has a pre-eminent share of the truest culture and the highest intelligence in America —that the Press is silenced from its usual jeers at anything psychical. The clergy

"regard the subject with grave apprehension, and on all sides they are discussing the situation with great earnestness. They hardly know how to deal with the danger, for the sincerity of all infected with the new faith is undoubted, and any policy of opposition or denunciation serves only to increase their ardour. Scores of applications have been made to Evangelical churches of the Baptist, Methodist, Congregational, and Episcopalian denominations for letters of dismissal that the applicants may join the Christian Scientists' church. All such applications have been refused, but the converts to the new idea nevertheless worship with those of the new creed."

As for the physicians they, though more affected than any section of the community, except the actual converts, regard "the craze" as an evanescent curiosity, a sort of collective hallucination which runs a rapid course among a susceptible and excitable people.

"Doctor," a veteran practitioner was asked recently, 'why don't you take in your sign now that these mind-cure people have shown that no one need be sick unless he has a mind to?' 'Don't make fun of fools, young man,' the reply came, 'it only strengthens them in their folly. When people ask me if there is anything in mental healing, I say yes, of course there is. Every physician knows that when a patient's mind or imagination is in sympathy with him, the work of curing is in many cases half done. In dealing with mental and nervous diseases, one object aimed at is to secure absolute peace of mind on the part of the patient. Then nature will work her own cure. Sometimes it is necessary to administer a few bread pills or a few drops of coloured water to induce full confidence. But it is useless to argue with people who try to show that there is no sickness and that poisons won't kill. The craze might as well run its course.'"

A correspondent of the Times, dating from Boston (May 11th), gives an elaborate account of the progress of this mental healing, and cites abundant testimony as to the reality of the cures effected. Although he is by no means disposed to accept every alleged cure as necessarily such, and although he satirises severely the absurdities of the system, he holds such language as this with regard to it:—

"Absurd and idiotic as some of the ideas are which the prophets of the system advance, the movement has far outgrown the limits of a popular but temporary craze. The 'wonderful cures' of the mental healers have been so persistently proclaimed that a large proportion of average Bostonians are willing at least to admit that 'there is something in it.' Hundreds claim to have been benefited in varying degrees by mind-cure treatments. Many such become themselves healers, and thus the new idea has spread. Scores of the most valued Church members are joining the Christian Scientist branch of the metaphysical organisation, and it has thus far been impossible to check the defection. It is a movement far-reaching in its influences and including many thousands among its sympathisers whose ordinary good intelligence entitles their judgment to respect. It would be useless to deny that, under the influence of the mind-cure practitioners, beneficent, and in some cases remarkable results, are attained. There is testimony in abundance, radical, positive, and undoubtedly honest, from people who claim to have been cured by the new agency of organic disease of long standing; but investigation develops so many weak or incredible points that close analysis is almost always unsatisfactory in its results. Illustrations might be detailed by the score."

The founder of this system is one Mrs. Mary B. G. Eddy. She claims for it a Divine origin, and gives the following account of the way in which she was led to her present belief:—

"In 1866, according to her story, she fell accidentally upon the side walk and suffered spinal injury and paralysis, which physicians declared would result fatally in a few hours. Her pastor called to see her just before the end was apparently at hand, and offered her consolation. She begged him to return in the afternoon, but no one believed she would then be living. By revelation from Heaven at that time God's actual relation towards her and to the human race was made clear, and she realised that her hurt was but an error which, when supplanted by the truth, would disappear. By the light of her new knowledge she brought herself, by mental process, into a proper attitude toward Jehovah, and when the clergyman called a few hours later, expecting to comfort a bereaved family, she met him at the door. Ever since, Mrs. Eddy says, she has had the power of healing others as she was herself healed."

Mrs. Eddy is probably made of the stuff that is more familiar to us in the medium or psychic. She is probably enough a medium; and it is characteristic of this new spiritual outburst that it has about it more or less of a religious flavour, as all, or almost all, the phases of what we loosely call Spiritualism have. Mrs. Eddy's evangel indeed, as conveyed by the Times correspondent, is of a very mixed character—"a mixture of Buddhism and Pantheism," the Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D., unkindly calls it, as well as "a witches' cauldron," which is at once unintelligible and rude,—but it has its affinities with spirit-teaching. God is alluded to as the Great Spirit, the All-pervading Mind. Matter is nothing: the shadow and reflex of Spirit. Personality is the embodiment of mind. The true Ego is outlined and conditioned by the body; so that the source of all must be sought, not in the body, but in the mind. Hence the rationale of the mind-cure. A free use is made of Biblical terms, and the Christian Scientists, as the sect is called, profess to present a refined and spiritualised Christianity for the acceptance of a world that has outworn the orthodox presentation of the teachings of the Christ. It is not necessary to have a very minute acquaintance with the way in which the efforts of the world of spirit to come into relation with the world of matter are traceable, to recognise this as one of such attempts. It bears on its face the family likeness. It is of the same curiously mixed nature: in its philosophy important truths are jostled by ludicrous absurdities; "the treasure," such as it is, is contained in "earthen vessels"; the stream of truth has lost its purity in passing through human vehicles. But it is none the less significant that a considerable section of the orthodox Boston clergy find in the teaching of the Christian Scientists much that they can accept, while all Christian teachers, of whatever sect or party, are fully alive to the importance of the movement as well as to its possible danger. The delusion, say some of them,

"is most insidious. The large use of the Bible, the strenuous demand for holiness and self-abnegation in the disciples, the results apparently effected in the ministry to the sick—these are very powerful considerations for attracting converts. And so hundreds of young ladies especially are drawn into the system under the impression that they are getting some finer quality of Christianity. Dr. Gordon predicts that this is not the final issue. If the body is only a phantom and the flesh only a shadow, by and by some very practical sinners will take refuge under the system, and insist that the sins of the body and the transgressions of the flesh are harmless, since they are only the phantom of a phantom and the shadow of a shadow. Dr. Gordon regards the whole system as a sort of witches' cauldron, in which every conceivable heathen and Christian heresy is seething and simmering to produce the subtle essence called 'mental medicine.'"

It is easy, on the other hand, to make fun out of the contradictions and absurdities which beset the utterances of Mrs. Eddy and her friends. The fundamental idea of the mind-cure is that there is no such thing as sickness. Disease, says Mrs. Eddy, is an error of the mind, the result of fear, i.e., of faith inverted and perverted. Yet this lady asserts that her husband, who died three or four years ago "was murdered by an enemy among the Scientists who thought arsenic into him." Can any suggestion be more gruesomely grim and grotesque? There is no such thing as disease, no pain, no cause for death; yet your enemy sits at ease in his arm-chair and "thinks arsenic" into you till you fancy you are dead; for, I suppose, if disease is an error, death is a greater one still. No one, however, seems to attribute to these queer enthusiasts anything but sincerity of purpose. "None of them have sought to fill their purses by practising the new method." It is true that hardly any two agree in their conceptions of the "science" nor in their idea of the vis medicatrix which they set in action.

"One lady believes that to be a consistent healer one must be a Universalist in religious faith. Another insists that the minds of her patients shall be made entirely free from guile, and accordingly she asks for a full statement of their lives. Many persons who study the system renounce all religious and superstitious ideas in connection with it, but recognise the physical phenomena, which they do not attempt to explain, and practise the art as successfully as any. A lady in Hyde-park, Massachusetts, who takes this position, says she finds herself possessed of a power over many serious ills which she hardly knows how to use. She says she prays earnestly and the ailment of the sufferer seems to be transferred to herself. Then she is able easily to throw it off. She does not know whether to call it mind-cure, faith-cure, or magnetism. Some operators say they use no will power, but simply keep before their minds an image of perfect health, and let God or the truth work through them. Others exert the will intensely to drag out the disease, as it were, by main force."

There is plenty of divergence here. Yet they go on honestly pursuing their effort to think health into a perverse and stiff-necked generation, which they have, indeed, affected in a quite unexpected way.

"Here is a familiar Boston parlour scene; two ladies sit a little way apart in Quaker-meeting silence for perhaps twenty minutes. The face of one is as hotly flushed as if she had been indulging in violent exercise, physical instead of mental. The other, the patient, apparently dozes in her chair. Externally this is all that constitutes a mind-cure treatment."

No one seems to doubt the honest intention. Yet it is easy to see what a happy hunting ground is here disclosed for the quack, the impostor who trades on human credulity and folly, the charlatan who lives on the foibles and frailties of his fellow-creatures. These gentry—whom the Times correspondent comprehensively sums up as "scalawags," an awesome term of much suggestiveness—will, unless I am much mistaken, turn all this healing to their own nefarious ends. It is to be expected. So long as there is human weakness, there will be human rascality to prey upon it. The millennium is not yet; and the lion devours the lamb instead of lying down by its side. What we are interested in finding out is whether there be at the bottom of this mental healing any germ of truth at all. For myself, I believe that there is. But I believe it to be an old truth in a new guise; one that the world has known for ages, and has greatly neglected and ignored, viz., the potent influence of mind on mind; the almost miraculous effect that can be produced by a strongly magnetic will on an imagination that has been quickened into activity.* But, however this may be, the story of the mind-cure in Boston is a curious narrative of some spiritual significance in the midst of many that this curious age is more or less familiar with.

HYPNOTISM is a term employed to describe a state which was signified by Piorry in 1815. He recorded the effect of the prolonged action of a shining object, or of a monotonous movement upon the brain through the eye, determining in certain individuals of what is termed the nervous temperament, a state denoted by certain strange symptoms called hypnotic (from hypnos, sleep), in which there is a peculiar sleepiness, accompanied by insensibility to physical impressions, with intellectual action, excitable by persistent impressions upon the auditory nerves. It is well to remember, however, that if this state is too prolonged partial paralysis, or epilepsy, &c., may be induced; although such disorders would promptly disappear under magnetic influence wisely directed.—REIGNER.

* The Times, May 26th; St. James's Gazette, May 29th, 1885, contain information on the subject of the mind-cure.

PHENOMENA CALLED "SPIRITUAL" ILLUSTRATED BY CHROMO-LITHOGRAPHY.* XIII.

By J. G. KEULEMANS.

PLATE IV.—BUST OF JOHN KING.

Now it may be argued that all these differences in expression, as likewise in the length of the body, can be artificially produced; that every person can to a certain extent—some even remarkably so—change their features and, with the addition of an artificial beard, a pair of thick-soled boots, or a touch of paint, give themselves an almost unrecognisable appearance. My answer is that as regards the length of the "spirit" form, the measurement I have taken was that of the form standing with his naked feet on a luminous slate against the medium standing in his boots; that besides, I have, on more than one occasion, seen the "form" of "John King" exhibiting the medium by passing the luminous slates over the latter's head and shoulders. Granted that there is nothing absolutely wonderful for a person to alter his facial expressions, and that, owing to the subdued light, the slightest modification may appear a perfect metamorphosis, there still is some difficulty, almost amounting to an impossibility, in altering the shape of one's nose; especially if it happens to be a little out of the regular form. I have found "John's" nose invariably straight, as far as the bridge is concerned; and what may be considered equally important is that those "spirits" regularly "showing themselves" have all perfect noses, somewhat of the "John King" type, but still varying in length or other slight details.

As to the difference between the eyes of the medium and those of "John King," suffice it to say that indications of an extremely weak eyesight are plainly observable in the medium, whilst "John" has normal and even powerfully expressive eyes. This, like the difference in the shape of the nose, is a sufficient proof that "spirit" and "medium"—no matter whether we are beholding a materialisation or a transformation—are distinct individualities. In the latter case, although it is the medium's person which is used, the substance, i.e., the material part constituting the body, has been so modified—"blinded" with an extraneous individuality as to be no longer its former self.

Whether materialisations and other kinds of form manifestations are explicable by scientific methods is not a question we are dealing with at present. My opinion is that these manifestations are beyond the reach of physiological experiment or analysis. But what we have to decide is, whether we are dealing with facts, or with frauds or delusions. In my short remarks anent "John King" I have merely quoted my personal observations from séances held with his only medium, Mr. Husk. Of these séances, now numbering over 200, about one-third were held at the private residences of both inquirers and confirmed believers. With the almost insignificant exception of twelve occasions, "John" appeared at each, either as a bust or in the full form, and, in most cases, under test conditions, viz., the medium's hands being held throughout the evening. It is needless to point to the impossibility of introducing tricks or confederates under such circumstances; it would be equally absurd to suppose, as some sceptics often do, that the "John Kings" are one and all mediums made up for that rôle, because, in Mr. Husk's case, an alteration of the bony part of the nose, like the self-restoration of normal sight, is beyond human powers to achieve. Besides, the application of special tests, of which I will quote the more interesting only, must, as regards spirit individuality, set further doubts at rest.

A very novel, and at the same time highly satisfactory experiment, at which I personally assisted, was made by an inquirer (Mr. S.) about a year ago, the object being to ascertain the possibility of procuring a materialisation inside an air-tight receptacle. A wedge-shaped india-rubber bag had been prepared for the occasion, the narrowest part measuring about eighteen square inches, the widest portion about four-and-a-half square feet, the length of the apparatus being about five feet. From the above dimensions it will be seen that a human form might, without much inconvenience, be placed inside. The narrow part, which was the only opening, was placed against the medium's chest; two flaps at the side of the opening, passing under his arms, were securely tied behind his back, both the medium's arms remaining free. The larger part of the bag was suspended by ropes from above to prevent it from collapsing; the under surface rested on a table, the medium being seated on a chair before the table. Inside the receptacle, at its farthest distance—about five feet—from the medium's chest, we placed the fairy-bells. Mr. S. and myself remained standing, at times changing our position from the side to the front and back. Fully satisfied that the apparatus was in proper condition and large enough to hold even two forms, we asked whether any "spirits" were present. A voice from inside was heard to complain of the narrow space allowed for the experiment, and also of the disagreeable smell of the material. We heard two voices discussing this particular predicament of being for the first time since their experience of free "spirit-life" locked up in a sack! Meanwhile "John's" voice was heard outside the bag, right overhead, holding conversation with us anent the test. Inside, the fairy-bells were played upon, and, judging from the heavy lumps that were administered against the sides and upper portion of the spirit-prison, it seemed evident we were holding at least one substantial prisoner in custody. Our conversation with the latter inside, and with "John" outside, continued for some twenty minutes, when one of the prisoners volunteered to give an extra final test to demonstrate his substantiality. We were asked to place our heads against the side; I merely put my hand in that attitude, when at once a strong blow from the inside was given against it. After the experiment "Irresistible's" voice was again heard overhead, jocosely complaining of the treatment he had received. Now here, the distinct entity and individuality of at least two spirits is proven beyond a doubt. How far both voices inside represented an equal number of materialisations I am unable to affirm, since voices are frequently heard to speak independently of substantial or visible organs of speech.

Another experiment, equally successful, was as follows: "John" once appeared as a bust in front of the medium. He then, upon request, exhibited the latter with the luminous slates, this time standing in full form behind the medium. I purposely engaged in some conversation with "John," in order to satisfy myself that "John" was not a "form" made up for the occasion, i.e., an imitation "John King." I saw the medium still seated, and in deep trance, whilst "John" was standing behind and answering my remarks. Then, the luminous slates having been replaced upon the table, "John" once more showed himself with the large disc-light, the so-called "John's" own light, and made a sudden movement, from the left side of the medium, backwards. It would be utterly impossible for any human being to imitate this. The form neither stepped nor floated backward, but seemed to glide sideways with the swiftness of lightning.

Another test, self-imposed by "John," which I have recorded on a previous occasion, and is of the same convincing nature; the narrow welded ring on the arm of the medium, before and after the séance, was found to be absent from "John's" arm.

(To be concluded next week.)

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK. XXX.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

There could scarcely be a brighter or more hopeful outlook for the cause we love, which is that of the knowledge of truth, than the announcement in "LIGHT" of the speedy publication of the facts of Mr. Eglinton's mediumship, so illustrated as to give thousands of readers almost the same advantage as they enjoyed who attended his sances. It was also a happy thought—or inspiration—to ensure the extension of the beams of "LIGHT" by the same operation.

The apathy of so many Spiritualists as to any missionary effort—any extension of what they know of truth to others—is easily accounted for. The more easy the demonstration of any truth the less trouble we take. "They can know if they like," we say: and "they are sure to know some time." One who believes that printing tracts or Bibles will save souls from eternal tortures gives sixpences or even shillings to the Tract or Bible societies. The Spiritualist who believes that all souls are in the path of progress has no such motive to put his hands into his pockets.

So much the more credit to a Spiritualist like Mr. Blackburn, who has done so much for mediums and investigators, and to whose wise and benevolent liberality we are indebted for some of the most thorough investigations ever made—some of the strongest testimony ever published. The astonishing thing is that any who have the power of doing such work should hesitate to use it.

I admit that Spiritualists have no such motives as those which inspire the Salvation Army. It is not a matter of life and death. We have no call to blow trumpets or beat drums—but we ought to do what we can to give to others who desire it any truth that is a source of comfort to ourselves—much more a truth that may rescue men from agony and despair.

The assaults of the religious Press upon Spiritualism just now on both sides of the Atlantic cannot fail to awaken inquiry and promote investigation. The Satanic theory, of course, utterly overthrows the charge of fraud. To be diabolical the manifestations must be real. The juggling tricks of a pretended medium are one thing, the Satanic devices which might deceive the "very elect" must be something quite different. Signs and wonders which portend the speedy destruction of our planet, or the universe itself, may be Satanic, but they cannot be humbug.

So far, the religious Press is doing our work. The ghost stories in magazines and newspapers are also doing it. The studies of witchcraft, and what are considered the superstitions of savages, are likewise calling attention to Spiritualism. The "free-thought," too, which prompts to the investigation of every fact of human interest cannot fail to promote a knowledge of Spiritualism.

By the way, did you ever read "the Shorter Catechism agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster"? A friend, a Scottish clergyman, has kindly sent me a copy, printed by authority of Her Majesty the Queen. It begins with the "chief end of man" and ends with the Apostles' Creed. But there was a blank page of the cover to fill which something was wanted, as true, and if possible, almost as useful as the Catechism itself. To make a sure thing of it the cautious Scotch printer has given us the multiplication table.

Now my question is whether the words "printed by authority," under the lion and unicorn, "Honi soit qui mal y pense," "Dieu et mon droit," apply to the fact that 12 by 12 equal 144. Does Her Gracious Majesty equally authorise the statement that "two and two make four" and the effectual calling of Calvinistic theology?

Or have we the Queen's authority for the statement that, "From the beginning of the world to the resurrection of Christ, God appointed the seventh day of the week to be the weekly Sabbath; and the first day of the week ever since, to continue to the end of the world, which is the Christian Sabbath"; and where, between the two lids of the Bible, is there any ground for such a statement?

"Prove all things: hold fast to that which is good." That is in the Bible. "Try the spirits" is also a Biblical injunction. From Genesis to Revelation we have a continuous record of spiritual manifestations. Of course, no one who believes his Bible can question the possibility of such manifestations—or doubt that they may "happen" at any time or anywhere. The handwriting on the wall of the banqueting hall at Nineveh is repeated in the messages written on slate or paper at a sance. Why should men who have seen, heard, and felt, the materialised spirit, "John King," find any difficulty in believing that the materialised spirit of Samuel had a conversation with King Saul?

The good mediums—the prophets—were sometimes killed as well as the bad ones, the witches, who have been burned or hanged by hundreds and thousands, almost to our own day. Even now, our mediums are persecuted and at times imprisoned. Under existing English law any London magistrate could have sent Mr. Eglinton to gaol for three months, for his slate-writing sance with Mr. Gladstone—while he, Prime Minister of England, knowing there is such a law, does not move for its repeal. He profits by the power of an admirable medium for spiritual manifestations, declares that they are worthy of scientific investigation, and yet leaves in force a law under which Mr. Eglinton could be sent to hard labour in prison for three months for every exhibition of a power which Mr. Gladstone thinks men of science ought to investigate! Can inconsistency go much farther?

The Beacon Light, a new Spiritualist weekly in New York, gives a pretty anecdote of the Swedish novelist, Frederika Bremer. During her American tour she enjoyed, as the writer of this note has done, the generous hospitality of Madame Le Vert, of Mobile, Alabama. It was observed that at a certain hour every day she retired to her room. This caused disappointments to visitors, but her explanation was that she had promised this hour to her sister, who sat at the same time in Sweden, each for the time being conscious of the feelings and thoughts of the other.

In a similar way Judge Edmunds, during a tour in Mexico, was in daily communion with his daughter in Brooklyn, New York. Both recorded their experiences from day to day, and the two records were in perfect agreement.

The hold that Spiritualism has upon great numbers of intelligent, cultivated people in England is shown by the weekly meetings held in nearly all our towns, and in the fact that Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond has—for the second time crossed the Atlantic to give a series of inspirational discourses on Sunday evenings, at the New Town Hall, in High-street, Kensington, to full and appreciative audiences.

"The spirits" seem determined to give us all the instruction we are likely to make a good use of. I read, for example, that the controls of Miss Bond discoursed eloquently on health, marriage, and the conditions necessary for the generation of a higher type of humanity. And we may reasonably expect that spirits will use their opportunities for the improvement of the race. In fact, knowing their power over the minds of all sensitive speakers and writers, may not we fairly attribute a large part of our best lessons on life, health, and culture, to spirit wisdom and influence? For one person consciously impressed, a hundred may be unconsciously influenced.

Victor Hugo, who held such a mastery over the mind of France, though he declined the proffered aid of the Church, declared his belief in God and immortality, and his desire for the prayers of all good people. His spiritualistic ideas were evident both in his writings and from his conversations with friends. "We do not die altogether," he would say; "our individuality survives; and, while I am talking to you, I am certain that all around me are the souls of all the dear ones that I have lost and who hear me." He could never quite reconcile himself to the fact that his favourite daughter, who was drowned, was really dead. He often thought he heard her footsteps in the house and her hand on the handle of the door:—

" . . . Silence! elle a parlé!
Tenez! voici le bruit de sa main sur la clé!
Attendez! elle vient. Laissez-moi que j'écoute;
Car elle est quelque part dans la maison, sans doute!"

The hope and expectation of a continued existence—a life beyond the grave—must be instinctive or natural to man, since it is the basis of every religion. How far back, or to what extent, there have been evidences of spirit existence, in apparitions and other objective manifestations, we cannot say—but our earliest literature and art are full of them. Romans, Greeks, Egyptians, Syrians—all the oldest peoples in the world were Spiritualists.

The conversion of one of the most eloquent Secularist lecturers in America—Mr. Chainey—to Spiritualism was preceded by a similar conversion in England. Edward Edwin Pearce writes to the Medium and Daybreak: "A fortnight before Christmas, 1883, being at Ashington, Northumberland (an entire stranger to place and people), I was invited to a private circle, and then heard such wonderful facts, many of them known to no one on earth but myself, that I was determined to investigate Spiritualism. I was told of various gifts I had, and that if I gave conditions I should be able to photograph spirit-forms, to heal and alleviate pain in others, without medicines. I took the first spirit form in May, 1884, in full sunshine, and since then often take them. My first cure was a bad leg of nine years' standing, after physicians and doctors had failed. I was astounded when a spirit told me I could ease the pain of a lady friend, who had lost her leg by amputation, she living twenty-four miles away. I tried the experiment, and am happy to record the fact that since last February she has had neither ache nor pain in it. I have had such proofs of spirit existence and identity, that I should be worse than a fool if I denied the truths of Spiritualism; and I find my new belief more cheering than the old one of annihilation, and more beneficial to my neighbours. No other creed under Heaven could have convinced me of a continued, sentient life beyond the grave; and after twelve months' experience, my advice to all Secularists—I have a warm heart to, and always like to fall in with them—is: Investigate! Investigate! Investigate! and if you find you are on the right side, Develop! Develop! Develop! and you will find truth without priest or parson." In fact we owe one of our best mediums to the conversion of a Secularist lecturer to Spiritualism.

"The Resurrection Body."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me space in your valuable journal to answer a letter signed "A Spiritualist," that appeared in your columns on April 11th, in reference to a letter of mine on "The Resurrection Body," that appeared in "LIGHT" on April 4th?

And first, let me say how sorry I am that my prolonged absence from home from ill-health, added to my wish to give the fullest information required by "A Spiritualist" and others (in private letters) on the subject, has led to a much longer silence on my part than I at all anticipated, for which I must beg their kind indulgence. I now find that my record of Liebig's great feat of reducing a human body to an impalpable, elementary condition is taken from Dr. N. B. Wolfe's "Startling Facts in Modern Spiritualism," pp. 148-9.

It occurs in Dr. Wolfe's address to those who were assembled to attend his mother's funeral; and as all those of your readers whom the subject interests may not possess the book, I will, with your permission, transcribe Dr. Wolfe's words, as follows:—

"The distinguished German scholar, Liebig, the chemist, invited his class of students to his laboratory to witness the chemical analysis, or decomposition, of a human body.

"Pausing at the door, he turned to his 'three hundred' and said: 'This temple is devoted to science. We here seek to discover the great truths that are enveloped in matter. If any of you hesitate in the pursuit of knowledge, such as the crucible and retort unfold, do not enter here.

"God wants no wavering service from those who seek him."
"His laws are not past finding out, if we seek them diligently."
"Before him on the table lay a human body. This he prepared to dissolve by chemicals, and with test conditions to secure the recognition of the elements composing its organisation.

"The process was slow, the interest intense, but the fact was accomplished. He reduced one hundred and forty-five pounds of matter to an impalpable, elementary condition.

"The gases floating on the viewless air were inhaled into the lungs, such as were needed, by those present, and the remainder settled in the house, or escaped to the fields or woods, where they were taken up by the respiration of flowers, vegetables, or the leaf-lungs of trees.

"His work being completed, he said: 'Gentlemen, the matter you have seen dissolved has not been lost in any other sense than to the natural eye. It still exists in an elementary condition, and will enter millions of new organisations. Some of you have inhaled the oxygen, the flowers will take in the hydrogen and carbon, and the grain you see waving in yonder field will feed upon its liberated gases. The body which you saw can never be reorganised; it has passed away, and so will all our bodies, by the chemistry of the grave.'

As Dr. Wolfe does not quote chapter and verse for his authority for the above, I have been endeavouring to procure it, before writing this letter. But Liebig's works are so numerous that I find it would take an almost unlimited time to go through them in search of it.

I have, therefore, thought it best to give Dr. Wolfe's record in full, when, perhaps, should my letter meet his eye, he will be kind enough to tell us which of Liebig's works contains the all-important information—information which, however, I understand, is confirmed by chemical science of the present day.

Trusting to your kindness to insert this letter at your earliest convenience, I beg to remain, sir, faithfully yours,
May 28th, 1885.

"LILY."

Mr. Eglinton and the Society for Psychical Research.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Frank Hughes' letter in your issue of the 23rd ult., corrects Mr. Pease's inaccuracy regarding the sances held by himself and some members of the Psychical Society in January, 1884. But I have to complain not only that Mr. Pease should have had occasion to give publicity to a misleading statement, but that Mr. Hughes, in correcting it, should also have fallen into an error, which, although trivial in itself, is important because he was appointed to record whatever results occurred, and should, therefore, have been in a position to accurately state just what took place. This he has fairly done, but he says, "the remaining one" (of the series of six sances) "was attended by good manifestations." Now, the phenomena which he describes as having taken place at the fifth sitting, actually took place at our second meeting, and as the under-mentioned letter will show, Mr. Pease was actually present when we obtained the results to which Mr. Hughes has called attention.

I have permission to publish the following letter:—

London, 27th May, 1885.

DEAR MR. EGLINTON,—The sance to which Mr. Hughes refers took place at Mr. Pease's rooms, and was the second of the first half dozen. I sat on your right, and the lady (Miss G., I think) sat on your left. Mr. L. on my right, and Messrs. Pease and Hughes made up the circle. On that occasion lights were seen, raps heard, and Mr. L.'s hat (which he had placed on a table at a little distance behind him) was brought and put down on the table before him. Mr. Pease knew that these phenomena took place, and I think in justice to you he should have mentioned them.—Believe me, yours very faithfully,

J. PATTERSON.

The Psychical Society is, I believe, formed to critically investigate these and other phenomena, but I think I am right in asking what dependence we can place upon their researches when two of their prominent members transgress the first rules of accurate observation, and through which those situated like myself may suffer with the public.—Yours truly,

6, Nottingham-place, W.,

W. EGLINTON.

May 28th, 1885.

I HAVE KNOWN some who have attributed their incredulity to not having seen; and who, not wishing to believe, turn away or close their eyes that they may not see.—BUSSEBAU.

A PLEA FOR CANDID INQUIRY.

For nearly half a century phenomena have been presented to the world, which do not come within the range of those facts that are generally recognised by the acknowledged exponents of natural science. They have, as, judging by experience, might have been expected, been almost universally rejected.

The scientific world is precisely in the same position in relation to what have been termed spiritual phenomena, as was the learned world in relation to cosmic laws prior to the advent of Galileo; and as were the theologians and astronomers in relation to the structure and dynamic laws of the universe prior to the advents of Kepler, Copernicus, Galileo, and our own immortal Newton.

The great mass of mankind, as a matter of course, accepted the dicta of the learned, and the seeming truths of Ptolemy in relation to cosmical arrangements were, by the masses, accepted as thoroughly in the Middle Ages as are the real phenomena and philosophy of cosmic classification now accepted in accordance with the more accurate physical teachings of the present day.

Popular opinion in reference to abstruse and in a sense infinite phenomena, has been, is now, and probably ever will be valueless as evidence; it is merely a multitudinous, gregarious acceptance of the teachings of the learned, and specially of specialists in their respective departments.

Take for example spectrum analysis as an illustration. Are there 10,000 persons in Great Britain who understand analysis by the spectroscopic, and are there one-fourth of that number who have a thoroughly practical acquaintance with spectroscopic research? We may reply in the negative to each of these queries, and yet there are few educated adults who do not accept the teachings of spectroscopists, and feel confident that sun, stars and nebulae have been successfully analysed by them.

In relation to remote, occult, and abstruse phenomena, the mass of mankind must, as a matter of necessity, accept the teachings of the learned when there is among them a consensus of opinion.

Take, for example, the higher mathematics, the laws of planetary motion, the authenticity and genuineness of ancient records: all these phases of inquiry must, of necessity, rest on the labours of a few specialists, who have a genius, or special aptitude, for such investigations; but there are broad fields on which the investigations and opinions of the intelligent many are nearly, possibly quite, as valuable and reliable as are the investigations and inferences of the specially-trained few.

We refer, of course, to ordinary facts, such, for example, as the softness of paste and the hardness of iron, the mobility of water and its immobility in the form of ice. The opinion of an illiterate but ordinarily sane man is, in reference to the paste and iron, water and ice, as good a is that of the most profound scientist, in respect to hardness and softness, mobility and immobility; but as regards the laws which underlie the facts, the two men are upon an entirely different plane. They are more or less known to the scientist, but are quite beyond the ken of the unlearned.

This latter rule applied to some of the facts of modern Spiritualism, and especially to such phenomena as are those included under the term psychography, or writings produced under conditions in which no embodied human being can produce them, viz., in a closed and locked or sealed slate, or in a closed, sealed, and carefully tied book, produced not in darkness but in broad daylight; not in recesses, but in the critical investigator's own hand; not on slates and books provided by the psychic, but on slates and books furnished by the sceptical investigator, and without either slate or book passing from his own keeping,—we affirm that evidence such as this, which is of almost daily occurrence, is as valid in the experience of the ordinarily shrewd and intelligent man as it is in the experience of those who have made physical science a specific life study.

In these facts, which the writer and thousands of other cautious and critical observers have witnessed under various test conditions, we have physical phenomena appealing to the candid and capable of critical investigation. Critical investigation is one thing; dogmatic, blatant, supercilious, hypocritical investigation is quite another. The man who, in his conceit, approaches a psychic with an inflexible foregone conclusion that he is an impostor, may possibly not obtain that which he professes to seek; but any candid inquirer who seeks for evidence of an alleged occult fact in the presence of a psychic, and does not assume (because it is mere assumption) that he knows all the physical and psychological laws of the universe, will probably, during the first experiment, but certainly after due investigation, receive what would be to him absolute evidence of a psychographic power which, prior to his investigation, he thought outside the range of the possible.

Let Mr. R. A. Proctor modestly try the experiment, and Knowledge will be less dogmatically edited than it is at present.

"TWIXT TWO WORLDS."

We have much pleasure in calling attention to our advertisement columns, in which appears an announcement of the early publication of this volume. Through the generosity of Mr. Charles Blackburn we have been able to arrange terms by which the publication of the book will be of special benefit to "LIGHT," and we trust our friends will not hesitate to avail themselves of the opportunity now afforded them of not only obtaining a unique and valuable work, but also at the same time assisting to increase the circulation of this journal.

CATALEPSY.—Natural or spontaneous catalepsy is thus defined by Hufeland: "There is, in catalepsy, a suspension of the reciprocal influence of the soul and the body; and therefore insensibility of the muscles, but without spasmodic contraction; and so the patient's limbs retain the position they are put into. There is, in the body and the soul, a persistency of the state in which they happen to be at the moment of the attack; the body keeping in the same position, the soul in the same set of ideas. The fit lasts from minutes to hours, and in some cases, new and special sensorial aptitudes develop themselves, such as hearing and seeing at the pit of the stomach, or by the fingers, forehead, soles of the feet, &c." The catalepsy induced by magnetisation presents nearly the same symptoms, but in a weaker degree. Experience warrants the belief that by persistent magnetisation the most inveterate case of spontaneous cataleptic disorders might be cured.—REIGNER.

INQUIRERS AND INQUIRIES.

By "M.A. (Oxon.)"

No. III.

From what has hitherto been said, it must not be imagined that the difficulties in the way of the inquirer are either exclusively those of his own making, or necessarily insuperable. I am bound to say, as the expression of my own belief, that there are some who never surmount the obstacles that lie in the way of a personal experience of the reality of these occult phenomena. But these are comparatively very few, and I can refer the cause only to the action of the unseen agencies of whom and of whose methods I know so little. Most people who honestly desire to do so can, sooner or later, satisfy themselves of the action objectively on the plane of matter of some alien intelligence.

But even then the difficulties are by no means surmounted. There are various motives that induce persons to engage in an investigation that is not free from risk. Of the risk they know nothing when undertaking the investigation. Some escape it altogether, by reason of their not pursuing the subject far enough. Some find themselves face to face with it unprepared, and suffer or escape as the chance may be. Some elect, knowingly, to reckon with what may come, and penetrate beyond the domain of the Dweller on the Threshold, as occult writers call the guardian of the new world into which they wish to penetrate. But for all, whether they do or do not know it, there is a certain risk.

Some seek, out of mere curiosity, to know something by personal experience of that about which the world is talking. There are not many ways open, and the experiences of the average public circle are more or less satisfactory in proportion as the mind of the observer is more or less critical. It is very seldom, so far as I am able to judge by experience, that mere curiosity achieves satisfaction. And this I believe to be owing to the fact, in accordance with a spiritual law, that such curiosity does not necessarily imply any preparedness on the part of the curious inquirer. I again say that we are dealing, not with some problems more or less solved or capable of solution by a nimble mind on the plane of our ordinary knowledge, but with spiritual things, spiritually discerned, and thus only. It seems to me to be of the last importance to insist on the action of this law. These phenomena, these masses of information, are not evolved from our plane, but are governed by laws with the making of which we have no concern, and with the action of which we are very imperfectly acquainted.

The scientific inquirer is of another type. He seeks out phenomena that have so frequently occurred as to be fairly subject to inquiry from his point of view. He demands, and most justly, reasonable conditions for investigation. He usually obtains them; and he has done more to purify the whole range of spiritualistic phenomena from illusion, delusion, and conscious fraud, than we can just now well estimate. It is only when he tries to act as master of the situation that he finds himself baffled. He cannot repeat an experiment as the chemist can, for he has to reckon with an Unseen and Unknown Agent whom he has no power of commanding. But short of that, the whole of the phenomena known in Spiritualism are amenable to rigid scientific investigation. And the more of it they get the better for the cause of truth.

There is a third class, a very comprehensive one, that is attracted to the subject by a purely human longing for reunion with a lost and loved friend or relation. The instinct, so universal, is in itself an evidence that the thing is possible. It is exact to say that every man has within him an instinct of self-preservation, whereby he preserves to its consummation his own earthly life; an instinct of reproduction, whereby he provides for the perpetuation of his race; and an instinct of immortality, which testifies to the potentiality within his race of future existence. To these must now be added the instinct which causes a man, once the gates are ajar, to seek communion with those who have gone before him. As often as not he argues from his own consciousness of immortality to their continued life, and he seeks communion with them. I believe that many, if not most, of the inquirers into Spiritualism are animated by desires and longings such as these.

That some succeed, for they alone are the judges, is manifest to all who read the records printed on the subject. How many others, far more exact and precise than any that see print, live only in the inner chambers of the heart to which a sacred and solemn experience has been granted, it is not for me to say. They are rarely referred to, and surely are never dragged out for analysis and vivisection. But in a number of cases—I suppose I should say in a majority of cases—the desire is not gratified, the longing is unsatisfied, and the bereaved mourner is fain to believe that it is not well that his aching, yearning wish should drag his loved one back to this nether world. It is well if he adopts so reasonable a belief; but it remains that the affections, when deeply stirred, most strongly urge a man to seek an entry to the world of spirit, and also most frequently unfit him for a calm judgment on the results that he obtains.

TRANCE (Ectasis).—We define trance as a state resulting from a temporary relaxation of the bonds uniting soul and body. In it the countenance of the subject reveals emotions of joy, but sometimes of sorrow, as if it were contemplating some scene of the other world, which gives it happiness or grief according to its sympathies.—REIGNER.

NATURAL or Spontaneous Somnambulism is recognised by the following symptoms: While sleeping the subject hears, speaks, and acts as if awake, and when he comes out of the sleep he remembers nothing; most frequently he answers when spoken to, he walks about, busies himself, and often shows intelligence above that of his ordinary state. Many physicians have recognised the intelligence of somnambules—when the somnambule state has been induced by magnetisation—in diagnosing obscure disorder and disease; among them we have to name the renowned Hufeland, who in his "Manual of Practical Medicine," the fruit of half-a-century's experience, recommends when other means fail, in paralysis, the treatment by animal magnetism. But, on this point we hold that if it is employed in the incipency of paralytic affections, it will prove curative in the majority of cases, perhaps in all except those due to organic alterations of structure.—REIGNER.

PRECOCITY.—A journeyman baker named Gallé entered, a year ago, as a student of Hebrew, at the Ecole du Louvre. With no special preparation, in six months he passed seventeen others who, on entering, were advanced students. Every Friday he came to the Louvre and then returned to his kneading-trough. He is regarded now as an accomplished master of the Hebrew Bible. This case reminds us of that of Elihu Burrit. His father, a shoemaker, apprenticed him to a smith. Elihu had a passion for the study of languages. Here is the record, by himself, of one week of his time: Monday, June 18th, 1837. Headache. Forty pages of "Revolutions of the Globe;" sixty-four pages of Cuvier and French; eleven hours at the forge. Tuesday: Sixty-five lines of Hebrew; eight lines of Syriac; thirty pages of French; ten of Cuvier; ten of Danish; ten of Bohemian; nine of Polish; fifteen names of stars; ten hours of forge. Wednesday: Twenty-five lines of Hebrew; fifty pages of Astronomy; eleven hours of forge. Thursday: fifty lines of Hebrew; eight of Syriac; eleven hours of forge. Friday: Not well; twelve hours of forge. Saturday: Not well; fifty pages of natural philosophy; ten hours of forge." Elihu Burrit founded a League of Universal Brotherhood, and advocated an Inter-oceanic Penny Post. At his demise, at sixty-eight, in 1879, he was a Consul of the United States in England. Such cases of so-called precocity are explicable only, according to us, by the Spiritist doctrine of Re-incarnation.—Le Messager.

In Memoriam.

LISETTE MAKDOUGALL GREGORY.

By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

Once again in this changeable epoch the Angel whose mission is Revelation has removed from our midst a notable presence. My earliest reminiscences of Spiritualism, in common with those of many others, are associated with the name of Mrs. Makdougall Gregory. In her house I witnessed many of its most remarkable phenomena: at her table I met most of the Spiritualists of this and other countries with whose acquaintance I am honoured. She was emphatically a leader amongst us, a "Mother in Israel," whom we all regarded with the affectionate respect that her pure kindness of heart, her unwavering zeal, and her bright intellectual sympathy could not fail to inspire. She never tired of devising means to bring the facts and truths that she herself so highly valued to the notice of those who she thought either needed their comfort for themselves, or could advance their acceptance in the world. Since she became a resident in London, her life was one long crusade for the furtherance and dissemination of her faith. Her house was open to all inquirers; her resources, of whatever kind, were absolutely at the service of Spiritualism. She spent herself in her devotion; and too often, I sadly think, her overmastering zeal caused her to do what, for her own sake, had best been left undone. But no word of even gentlest criticism should find a place where the intent was so pure, and the self-sacrifice so complete. It is more congenial to the feelings with which a friend so close as I must pen a record of her life, to remember her as the embodiment in act of a faith which she held without an after-thought of doubt. Spiritualism was to her a religion, and she lived, as she died, a votary of its ennobling faith. She was essentially a religious woman, a humble and sincere follower of the Christ. I believe that her orthodoxy might successfully be impugned by a theologian: but I am fully assured that no one who knew her would deny to her the credit of a sincere and simple Christian faith. She put aside from her as hateful all the meaner conceptions of the Supreme which depict Him as vindictive, tyrannical, and, in a word, human—with the passions of a man without his sympathy and love. "That is not the God I know," she would say when some theological dogma peeped out in conversation. Over and over again she expressed to me her delight at the idea of God contained in my book of "Spirit Teachings," and her thorough sympathy with, and acceptance of, that ideal. More even than most of us, she lived in the worship of the simple Christ-life, as shown, not in theological systems, but in the Gospel pages. She was a true lover and worshipper of the Pattern-life: but there again her conceptions of it were not those of orthodox theology.

For a long time her friends must have had forced upon them the probability of her removal from this sphere of existence. Her fragile body had been a clog to her long before she was delivered from its burden. She had lived out the full term of earthly life, had completed a decade beyond that which the Psalmist assigned as the life of man, and she had been long prepared to go. She had suffered much from a racking cough, and it was in one of its paroxysms that a ruptured vessel terminated her earthly life, and set her spirit free. It was on Whit-Sunday—a happy day for the new birth of her spirit—that she entered into her new life. She had been alone, and had seemed as well as usual, when her bell rang loudly, and her servants, who had always surrounded her with such care and attention as they could, rushed to the drawing-room to find their mistress at its door, and already in the throes of the last struggle. She passed away before medical aid could be got; but no human aid would have availed her. Her hour was come, and she was ready for it. Let us who knew and loved her pray that her soul may rest in peace, and that she may enter into the fruition of that knowledge which she was the means of bringing to so many of us on earth. Her memory will long remain green for the sweet aroma of charity, sincerity, and love that breathes around it.

An intimate friend who, of late years, saw much of our departed friend, has kindly placed at my disposal some particulars which may fitly be appended:—

Mrs. Makdougall Gregory was one of three sisters, and the second daughter of Mr. John Scott, H.E.T.C.S., son of Mr. John Scott of Gala.

Her mother was a Miss Monro, a descendant of Sir Donald Macdonald, Lord of the Isles.

Her maternal grandmother was a German—Lady-in-Waiting to the Princess of Wales, mother to George III.

Mrs. Gregory assumed the name of Makdougall from the estate of Makerstoun in Roxburghshire, which came into her family at the death of her cousin, Lady Brisbane, wife of Sir Thomas Makdougall Brisbane, and only daughter of Sir Henry Hay Makdougall, Baronet, of Makerstoun, a kinsman of Sir Walter Scott, and representative of one of the most ancient families in Scotland.

The property is now held by her eldest sister, Miss Makdougall Scott.

Mrs. Gregory would have succeeded, and after her, until within the last few years, her grandson was the heir; but he being deceased, and her youngest sister also, it goes to her cousin, Mr. Hugh Scott, the second son of the late Mr. Scott of Gala.

Mrs. Makdougall Gregory was brought up by the Hon. Caroline L. Scott, daughter of Archibald, Lord Douglas and Lady Frances Scott, of Buccleuch, who married her (Mrs. Gregory's) uncle, Rear-Admiral Sir George Scott, K.C.B.

She was greatly attached to her aunt, and often alluded to the happy days of her childhood spent with her.

She went much into society, where she was sought after for her wit and repartee; but though admired in the fashionable world, she preferred to associate with people of science, and she married the late Professor William Gregory, M.D., F.R.S.E., Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh.

During her husband's lifetime they lived in Edinburgh in a little world of science and surrounded by those who appreciated his talents and culture. But after his death she came to London, and settled there.

Her only child was called Liebig, after Professor Liebig, her husband's great friend. He married Miss Fairfax, only sister of the present baronet, Sir William Fairfax. He lived but a few years after his marriage, and dear Mrs. Gregory's whole life seemed wrapped up in her only grandchild, who passed away at the age of eighteen about four years ago. Since then her life was cheered by constant communications from him, and last year at a séance with Mr. Eglinton he was able so perfectly to materialise in her drawing-room, in the presence of us all, that he came and embraced her, bringing beautiful flowers and whispering words of comfort in her ear, and then in a clear, legible hand he wrote a few lines of loving greeting at the table before us.

She was herself a writing medium, but her weak state of health prevented her writing more than a few words at a time, when her hand would be controlled by Professor Gregory or her son.

She has written one or two pamphlets on Spiritualism.

Her house was the centre for all Spiritualists, and she was the medium's friend, and her sociable gatherings will be remembered by a very large circle.

Her intellectual mind and strong reasoning powers attracted many from all parts of the world, and the Prince of Solms and Baron du Potet were among her truest friends.

Many will cherish her memory, for she had endeared herself to all who knew her by her kindness and geniality of manner.

She was truly philanthropic and generous. She devoted most of her time to bringing forward artists of humble means, especially those gifted with a talent for music, which she could so well appreciate, for she was herself an accomplished musician, and had the power to charm all who listened to her by the sweetness and delicacy of her touch both on the piano and the organ.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

The meeting of this Society, on the 27th ult., was devoted to the doctrine of Karma. The subject was briefly but ably introduced by Mr. C. C. Massey, of whose remarks we regret to be unable to give an abstract. He was followed by the president, Dr. Anna Kingsford, who defined the doctrine of Karma as being really an occult application of the doctrine of the Conservation of Energy, and means Spiritual Heredity. In one form or another it has always constituted an element in transcendental Theosophy, being—while specially developed in the Buddhist system—present in all others, Hebrew, Greek, and Christian. It is a corollary of the doctrine of physical rebirths. That which is re-embodied in virtue of the operation of Karma, is the true selfhood, or "character." But so long as rebirths continue, this selfhood is not free of matter; but carries with it from birth to birth a clinging remnant of its phantom investment, called Karma Rupa, and only when it has finally got rid of the impurity thus contracted, are the bonds which attract and bind it to the earth-life dissolved, and it is free to seek a loftier sphere. It is in order that this inner, essential being may grow and expand that rebirths are necessary. We come back, as Lessing said, again and again so long as earth has lessons to teach us.

All that has been in its nature eternal and noumenal in any incarnation; all that has contributed to build up the true and interior man, is absolute and permanent, and will survive all ephemeral elements in our past personalities. The true Ego of the individual, on attaining Nirvana, resumes in itself all that is lasting and noumenal of its past existences, and perceives them as constituting an uninterrupted whole—a continuous chain of cause and effect—and is known by other souls, similarly redeemed, in all its various characters. For only that which in its nature is divine can endure perpetually.

It is the doctrine of Karma and of continuity of existences which alone explains the inequalities and incongruities of life and vindicates the Divine justice. And, seen from this point of view, life has a far vaster scope than is compatible with the idea of a single existence, which makes the soul independent of the discipline of earthly experience, inasmuch as it denies such experience altogether to the vast number who die in infancy. That the Christian Scriptures do not explicitly recognise the doctrine is no argument against its being a Christian doctrine. It was already in the world in Buddhism; and Christianity, as the complement and crown of Buddhism, had no need to reiterate it. Besides the function of Christianity was to recognise a stage in the soul's elaboration at which Karma ceases to be operative. For the man who has "put on Christ" has entered already into Nirvana, "the peace which passeth understanding." He is saved from the earthly elements and the necessity of further revolving on the wheel of rebirths. "Hence," says Trismegistus, "he who knows God has overcome the power of destiny, and the ruling of the stars." Few who bear the Christian name attain to the Christian estate. "For strait is the gate and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." Yet this does not mean that the many are lost; but that they must bear their Karma, and return again and again until they find that only way. To remain only Buddhist, by being regenerate only in the human will, is not to win the salvation which is of Christ. The will of man takes the Kingdom of Heaven by violence, that is, by the intellectual way. But they who are in Christ take it by the way of the soul. Two thieves were crucified with Christ, and a third—Barabbas—was dismissed, and had no part in the Lord's Passion. The thief on the right hand represents the will of man—the human will preached by Buddha, saved and regenerate by means of the Divine Will. The thief on the left is the animal will which must be left behind and abandoned; the rebel will, which mortification and crucifixion only can overcome; and the thief which is released to the multitude is the outermost principle, the mere titanic or structural nature-force, which has nothing in Christ. Thus, although the doctrine of Karma is implied in Christianity, it is not made conspicuous, because Christ "destroys Karma, and him that hath the power of death."

The papers were followed by a prolonged discussion of high interest. Among those who took part in it was Mrs. Macdonald, the accomplished authoress of the recent article in the Fortnightly Review, entitled "Buddhism, and Mock Buddhism."

NERVOUS DISORDERS.—Neuroses is the term applied to those disturbances of sensation, motion, and intelligence which, after manifesting themselves, pass off without leaving a trace in the organism: such are hysteria, catalepsy, hypnotism, trance, &c.; all most amenable to magnetic treatment.—REICHER.

To her revered name all Spiritualists owe a debt of gratitude, for she worked and lived for the cause of Spiritualism—ever ready to help anxious inquirers and affording them means and opportunities of investigating the grand phenomena.

To the doubtful and wavering she never lost an occasion of saying a word in season—guiding them and encouraging them with the comforting assurance of communion with their loved ones gone before.

Her whole soul seemed to go out as a great wave in the ocean of life, to bear away the burdens, griefs, and sorrows of humanity—so large, so noble was her generous heart.

Let us lay at her feet a crown of "immortelles" as a lasting tribute of regard to her memory, remembering that though in her we have lost an earthly friend, in her death we have gained a spiritual guide.

At Cavendish Rooms, 51, Mortimer-street, Langham-place, W., on Sunday evening, June 7th, at seven o'clock, a floral service will be given in memory of Mrs. Gregory, by the congregation of Spiritualists, conducted by Mr. J. Burns, of the Spiritual Institution. Miss Young, Miss Maltby, Miss Wade, and other mediums and speakers will take part. Friends who desire to assist are invited to communicate. Offerings of flowers for the table are solicited.

GENERAL CAMPBELL, R.E.

Our transition record has been unusually heavy lately and just as we go to press news reaches us of the passing away of another warm friend and generous supporter of the Spiritualist movement. General Campbell was a comparatively recent addition to our ranks, having been convinced of the reality of spiritual phenomena through the instrumentality of Mr. W. Eglinton. He was, however, a born Spiritualist, and in his receptive and prepared mind the truths of Spiritualism found a fruitful soil. In society he was well known in connection with one of the brightest achievements of human endurance and valour, having passed through the Indian Mutiny and gained much distinction by his heroic defence of the lives and liberties of English women and children at a time when strength of purpose, nerve, and calm judgment were above all things an absolute necessity. In his transition, those who knew him cannot but feel that a noble life has passed to a nobler heritage, and in remembering the valorous deeds, the unflinching honesty of purpose, and the intense desire for the good of his fellows which characterised the man, they cannot but be assured that these qualities will not be less pronounced as regards the spirit, in the land beyond the veil.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

THEON.—Letter received. Is it not, however, unreasonable of you to complain because we require a reference from any stranger desiring to advertise as a medium or psychic in our columns? If you can refer us to any well known Spiritualist, we shall be happy to take your advertisement on the usual terms.

DURING the past week Mr. Eglinton has been giving some very successful séances to undergraduates at Cambridge University.

A SUGGESTION has been made to the effect that we should reprint Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace's article in last week's "LIGHT" as a tract. We shall be happy to do so if 1,000 copies, at 12s. per 100, are ordered in the course of the ensuing week.

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS (43, Manor-place, Walworth-road).—On Sunday evening last, Mr. James Veitch delivered a lecture on "Faith Healing." He took a far wider view of the subject than is generally held by Christians. He showed that not only believers in orthodox Christianity, but also Spiritualists and others, were recipients of this wonderful healing power. He contended that the cures which to-day are said to be wrought at Bethshan Hospital by a certain kind of faith, are eclipsed by the greater and more wonderful cures wrought by the power of magnetism through the healing mediums connected with Spiritualism. After the lecture ample demonstration of healing power was given by Mr. Raper, a healing medium. The subject proved of such interest that it will be continued next Sunday by Mr. James Veitch lecturing on "Faith Healing: What is it?"

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.—The discourse announced in our issue of last week was delivered, on Sunday evening, to a large and sympathetic audience at the Kensington Town Hall. It was stated that to many, mind, spirit, and soul were identical conceptions. In truth, they referred to the threefold nature of man. The mind, or reason, was produced by the action of the spirit on the physical brain, which acted like a mirror, reflecting the impressions of the spirit. The mind perished with the brain. It even changed during life. Reason might be correct and logical in its deductions, but the truth of its conclusions depended upon the truth of its premises. The spirit was the vitalising spark, which proceeded from the soul within. It pervaded and controlled the material atoms. The spirit resembled the physical form and character, though it was of a more refined and ethereal nature. When the change called death took place the spirit remained in a great measure in the same condition as while in life, though disconnected from mundane ties and influences. It had to purify itself, and gather up the lessons of world life, till it attained a conquest over matter, and learned to portray the aspirations of the soul. The mind was influenced by material considerations. The spirit was warped and clouded by imperfections of development. The soul was in the innermost. Its existence was evidenced by the consciousness, though perhaps dimly and imperfectly. It might lie dormant within, like the bud of the flower, awaiting expansion and growth. To the soul all things are clear. Its attributes are eternal and immutable—truth, justice, harmony, unselfishness. Might was by no means right. It is our duty to protect and assist, not to oppress the weak. In this world men are selfish. They strive to draw to themselves power and possessions. They do not seek the advancement and development of all around. In the next life, those that have been mighty rulers and wealthy, but have not been merciful and unselfish, will, when stripped of their earthly possessions, feel poor and weak indeed. After the discourse a touching poem upon the death of Victor Hugo was given, being the subject selected by the audience. It was announced that in future, before the address, a quarter of an hour would be devoted to giving answers to appropriate questions put by inquirers. The subject of next Sunday's discourse will be "Spiritual and Material Portents."

CAMBERWELL ASSOCIATION OF INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM.—A meeting has recently been held at 81, Wells-street, Camberwell, to organise a society for the investigation of Spiritualism. About a dozen members were enrolled, a set of rules adopted, and officers appointed pro tem. The Psychological Press had very kindly contributed several volumes and pamphlets to form the nucleus of a library, and it is hoped that friends interested in the subject residing in the neighbourhood will favour the association with their support by submitting their names for membership. It is proposed to hold meetings every Thursday at half-past eight o'clock. Mr. Price, medical mesmerist, will treat patients at the above address by appointment. Arrangements for Sunday evening, séances, &c., now in contemplation, will be advertised in due course. Copies of "LIGHT" and works on Spiritualism can be had.

GLASGOW—A FLOWER SERVICE.—An interesting as well as impressive ceremony took place last Sunday under the auspices of the Glasgow Association of Spiritualists. One of the members, Mr. Urquhart, having passed to the higher life, it was suggested that a flower service should, if possible, be arranged, primarily as a mark of esteem for the departed, and of sympathy and condolence towards the bereaved family, and secondly as an indication of the sense in which such an event is appreciated by Spiritualists. The co-operation of the members having been invited, the service itself bore ample testimony to a cordial response. Plants in abundance and flowers from the garden and the field were supplied, so that the hall at 2, Carlton-place, presented a most charming appearance when the audience assembled at the usual time, 6.30. In addition to the lavish and tasteful display inside the hall, almost every member wore some sprig of the season's blossoms on his or her person in honour of the occasion. The opening hymn having been sung, Mr. Robertson (presiding) gave expression to a few earnest and thoughtful remarks on the comparative influence of the ordinary funeral service and the haze and gloom which shroud, for the ordinary Christian, the life beyond, with that of Spiritualism, and the certitude that clears the vista and makes the future bright and blessed. Mrs. Wallis, under control, gave utterance to an impressive invocation, following with a short address, full of sympathy and encouragement for the bereaved, and of fervent exhortation to all to bear life's responsibilities and losses bravely and with patience to the end, that the record in each case might be a fair and honourable one when a like call should summon each and all, soon or late, to the grander life hereafter. A solo on the harmonium was then rendered, during which Mr. E. W. Wallis passed under control, and delivered an effective discourse on "Social States in Spirit Life." His instructors, too, made kindly and sympathetic reference to the event thus signalled, and further testified to having already met and greeted the departed in the spirit life. At the close of the service the cut flowers were distributed amongst the audience, which was unusually large, filling the hall to its utmost capacity.—SR. MUNGO.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fricse, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Rolan Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile o Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consentaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not blinded by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

— ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

— (Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

NATURAL SENSITIVES AND OUR LUNATIC ASYLUMS.

By SAMUEL EADON, M.D., M.A. (EDIN.), Ph. D.

Man is a compound being. Outwardly, there is the bodily and visible man; inwardly, the invisible body with the soul as its occupant. The former, the outcome of the latter, is an organisation designed for earth-life actions, purposes, and concerns. What spirit is, per se, we know not; what matter is, per se, we know not. There is, however, a dynamic force recently discovered, and which has always existed, though unknown, through, and by which, the invisible man within is found to act on the corporeal or visible man without. It is this medium of inter-communication and its laws of action which will claim our attention and investigation, as it may tend to clear up some mysticisms of metaphysics, some uncertainties of physiologic speculations, and, perhaps, enable philosophers to lay the foundations of a correct mento-physiologic science of mind, not to say, a rational and natural treatment of certain occult forms of disease.

The spirit-man, in the present life, can only make known its powers, by means of a material organisation adapted to its nature, and a dynamic force, in harmony with the invisible and visible framework of which it is the connecting link. In perfect health, there is a correct reciprocity of action between spirit-man and body-man by means of this natural medium, known as the od, or odylic force, which is dispersed through the material or body-organisation, according to certain pre-ordained and normal conditions, not only with regard to the body, generally, but in respect of the brain, particularly—that marvellously wondrous cerebral formation for the soul's action during the earth-life of man.

This od or odylic fluid permeates through, impinges on, and irradiates every atom of the human body when manifesting itself under normal conditions, either by giving elasticity, vigour, and buoyancy to the whole body, or, by firing the intellectual organs, with bright and original thoughts, or the emotional, with feelings, good, or the contrary.

This grand connecting link between the spiritual and corporeal man—the od force, as it has been called by Baron von Reichenbach, its discoverer, is generated in ample volumes in the body by the natural processes of primary and secondary assimilation, the necessary chemical changes, the respiratory processes, and the other elaborations of the body. It is a force analogous to, yet different, in many respects, from the other known forces of the physicists. It is not light, nor heat, nor electricity, nor magnetism, although with these it is always more or less conjoined. In crystals and the human organism it exists, and is manifested in its own pure and simple form of od. In motion it is not so rapid as that of light, but passes through solid bodies more quickly than heat. It radiates from all bodies, animal, mineral, and vegetable, in every direction, and when seen in the dark, by good Sensitives, all bodies appear like transparent crystals, and all of a glow. Distance limits not its power; nor does space mark out its boundaries of action. From experiments made, it impinges a rather disagreeable warmth from the moon and the other planets of our system, but a grateful coolness from the sun and the fixed stars. Like terrestrial magnetism, it is polar in its distribution; the North Pole being negative and cold, the south positive and warm.

With regard to the body, the brain is the great source of *od*ic irradiation, and from that focus the fluid streams to, and through, every part of the body. In the right hand, the force is negative and cold, and emits a blue light from the fingers; in the left, it is positive, and warm, and from the fingers, a light, of a red or orange colour, more or less, prevails.

This force ever tends to an equilibrium; hence, disturbances in *od*ic circulation, or its abnormal accumulation in vital organs, give rise to symptoms and pathological states adverse to those of health in its most lively forms.

From what has been advanced, it is not difficult to draw the inference, that body and spirit act and react on each other, by virtue of the odylic fluid or force interflowing in due quantity and volume, and permeating every organ with its life-sustaining influence. Hence, to be normal or healthful, this force should pervade every part in due equilibrium, neither too much, nor too little. The brain—the great odylic battery—is so charged as to control every part of the system, the minutest atom of the extremities receiving the *od*ic force in due quantity and proportion. The blood, also, is influenced during every moment of its circulation; the absorbents too feel the *od*ic whip ever ready to lash them for one moment's neglect of duty. The nerves, soon, become torpid and devoid of feeling, if they fail to respond to this vital gymnast, as it trips with light fantastic motion, along their delicately invisible strands. The bones, in health, glow with a sort of *od*ic incandescence and the whole body is radiant with bright light to the eye of a Sensitive. The *od*ic force, in its wide and destined forms of distribution, is, in fact, the medium of preserving and continuing human life. So long as these odylic streams roll on, as nature intended, there is health; if there is retardation, or reversal of currents, there will be disease in some form or other. If the normal or natural flow of this finely attenuated and infinitesimally dynamic agent cannot be restored, either by ordinary, or by extraordinary means, death, sooner or later, of necessity, takes place; for the object of all kinds of treatment which ever has been, is now, and that ever will be practised, can be no other, whether known to medical men or not, than the restoration of the reversal of the *od*ic currents to their natural or normal states. Disturbances, stoppages, and reversals of flow, are the sources, whether acknowledged or not, of every form of disease. Taking this view, which is really the generalisation of every

Theory of medicine ever put forth to account for diseased action on the human organism there is no wonder, in the present artificial state of society, when every man is in fever-heat to get rich, or to gain distinction, literary, theological, legal, or military, that abnormal disturbances should take place throughout the wondrously widespread web-work of the countless and invisibly acting strands of the nervous system; or, that the harmonious working between the spirit-man and the body-man, should become so frequently an utter impossibility on this earth-life of ours; or, that a double form of consciousness, or of ecstasy, or of trance, should be superinduced. If we only throw aside the dunce's cap, and reflect a little on the present state of things, the wonder is, that society should be as sane as it now is.

Insanity is a disturbance, more or less, in the circulation of the odic fluid, in one or more of the organs of the brain, not to mention, in that of the liver, stomach, lungs and other vital parts, which besides suffering from their own special local odic disturbances, are in full sympathy with the general polar disturbances from the cerebral organs to the pedal extremities. Need we be surprised, in such an abnormal condition of body, that insanity, or a state of high-wrought sensitiveness should spread through all classes of society, and its victims be counted by tens of thousands?

Our object in this paper is to call attention specially to a form of insanity (falsely so called), and to point out simple and common-sense means—scientific in fact, but perhaps not so, according to the already, and too soon wrapped up notions of some parties who seem not to know that education is the work of a lifetime, and that the acquisition of new ideas should only terminate with the grave—means, indeed, by which this form of insanity may be effectually cured, and often has been cured when all other measures have been tried in vain.

We admit, and rejoice to record, that the moral management of the insane has of late years greatly improved. This may be traced to more correct views on the philosophy of mind, owing to the brain being now admitted as the organ of the spirit's action during this life. The late Dr. Conolly, of the Hanwell Lunatic Asylum, introduced many improvements and modifications in the treatment of the insane. These were inevitable deductions and inferences derived from his thorough knowledge of the structure and physiology of the brain as explained and demonstrated by the writings of Gall, Spurzheim, and Combe; but the additional introduction of the human-magnetoid, or odic processes, by the physicians of our asylums, in certain cases, i.e., in natural, or superinduced Sensitives, and Clairvoyants, would be another step of advance in respect of curative treatment, and ought to be adopted by every physician at the head of our lunatic asylums.

It should be borne in mind, that all lunatics (of this class) are highly susceptible and impressionable, and may easily be brought under control, often by a concentrated glance of the eye, or a firm tone and command of the voice; and, sometimes, they may be influenced simply by bringing into play the laws of suggestion.

The ordinary way of making passes from the crown of the head to the pit of the stomach, by restoring a certain amount of equilibrium in the odic circulation, has procured, in countless cases, refreshing sleep, and dissipated, as if by magic, many old annoying symptoms. To procure, however, full recuperative effects, the brain must be subdued, and sleep brought on; and, in this class of patients, it is easily and often quickly done. Sometimes persons are so sensitive that they spontaneously fall into the odic sleep with the eyes wide open, and without any recollection of the previous state of consciousness. The man is now in a world of his own. All that is heard and seen is to him real and objectively present. The subject in this condition can converse with the absent, or, rising to a higher state of spontaneous extasis, hold converse with the denizens of the spiritual world. To outsiders, this is viewed as mere dreaming—a species of insanity, in fact, and the party is considered a proper subject for a lunatic asylum; but this is not so. In time, this sensitive wakes up into his ordinary state of consciousness, not knowing the slightest circumstance which had taken place in the previous mental condition.

Now, the above is not a real case of insanity, but merely one of maldistribution of the odic fluid, and requires only the skill of an enlightened physician to restore the magnetoid currents into their natural or normal channels.

A lady once fell spontaneously into a state of second consciousness, and, in that condition, became engaged to a gentleman in marriage. Before the event took place, however, the lady was seized with a severe fever, from which in due time she recovered, and her ordinary or natural consciousness returned. Her lover called to see her, but was received with all the coolness of a stranger, and with perfect indifference. All that had previously passed between them was a perfect blank. This lady had not been insane in the usual acceptance of the word, but had suffered from a superinduced degree of intense sensitiveness which had disturbed and thrown out of balance the healthy equilibrium of the odic fluid.

This, and many other alleged cases may easily be cured, either by the long magnetoid or odic pass, or by looking intently on a zinc and copper disc held in the palm of the left hand; or by gazing with intense earnestness and will-power into the eyes of the patient, or, according to Dr. Brad's plan, by the patient looking upwards, and a little on one side on some bright object, as the end of a silver pencil-case.

Any of the above methods will bring on, sooner or later, a deep sleep. When this condition is attained, the processes for equalising the odic fluid may then be made, and in due time a satisfactory, permanent, and naturally-brought-about cure, may be expected.

Methods of the kind just pointed out should be adopted in all our lunatic asylums, and a staff of assistants regularly set aside for the purpose of inducing the odic sleep, and of performing other recuperative manipulations under the direction and guidance of the physician.

The object in this kind of treatment is to restore the brain—the great odic battery of the system—to healthy action; to distribute and equalise the fluid in every part, and to administer such medicines as experience has sanctioned, and adopt those hygienic measures, the practice of which, during the last quarter of a century, in our asylums has been found so beneficial.

There are many other nervous diseases to which this form of treatment might prove of service; as, in producing insensibility to pain in surgical operations (much safer than chloroform); also, in rheumatism, neuralgia, and headache; in banishing wakefulness and inducing refreshing sleep; in relieving and often curing paralysis, hysteria, catalepsy, chorea, &c. To point out its uses in the above maladies was not our object, but to make evident, to everybody, a simple mode of cure, for many who are unnecessarily and cruelly confined in lunatic asylums.

If it is humane to point out such a simple mode of cure, how much more grandly moral, holy, and Divine would it be, in a physician, boldly to introduce such measures for the amelioration of his suffering patients, despite medical cliqueism and trades-union notions of etiquette!

We, none of us, are far removed from the border-line of insanity, and it behoves us and the public to see that the treatment in our asylums is curative as well as humane; for, be it remembered, that every third or fourth person in society is a NATURAL SENSITIVE, and susceptible to influences which tend to disturb, more or less, the normal circulation of this nervo-vital fluid in the system.

Thousands of highly sensitive and impressionable females, and men of lofty culture and profound intellectual attainments, are natural sensitives, and eminently susceptible to odic influences, not only from surrounding objects but also from persons, whose od force is antagonistic to their own. Many persons of this class have narrowly escaped being incarcerated in a lunatic asylum for life under the impression that they were persons of unsound mind, or beside themselves. It is to avoid such dire mishaps and prevent the stupid incarcerations of such persons that this paper has been written. When public opinion is sufficiently enlightened, no private pressure, for sordid ends can avail in withdrawing nervous and highly-sensitive natures from society, and prolonging a secondary consciousness, the opposite of that in which they had been born. But enough. The question is: Will the kind of treatment advocated in this paper be introduced into our asylums, public or private? The honest, kind-hearted, and just part of the community send their friends to these resorts to be cured, and not to be tinkered at, secundum artem. If certain methods and medicines pathogenetic to certain cases, are recommended, as excellently curative of patients in our lunatic asylums, who intervenes and plays the incarnate stupid, between the asylum-supporting-public, and the poor unfortunate patient? Who is it who stands at the door of these institutions and, with swaggering mien and proud gesticulation, assume that all knowledge centres in their own precious selves? Who is it who thunders forth, in proud defiance of public opinion, "Nullius addictus jurare non verba magistri"? If it be the doctor himself, he, above all others, not only for his own reputation and that of the institution over which he presides, and having the welfare of his patients at heart,—should act very differently. On no account should he pooh-pooh any means, if at all calculated to restore the patient to a healthy condition, merely because it is novel, or to avoid a little extra trouble. If this is the case with any physicians, it will not be long ere public opinion, with its overpowering censure, will make itself known, and show how best to deal with such impersonations of standstillism by leaving them "alone in their glory!" with rooms without patients, grounds without admirers, and a routine of dulness which ends in departure for ever.

So it will be with everybody who sets his face against new ideas. The approaching tide of medical improvement no man can stop. Vain will be the attempt of any medical Dame Partington, with largely-developed and cultured self-esteem, with broom in hand, to sweep back the onrolling waters of therapeutic improvements, of whatever description, in this late period of the nineteenth century.

INSTANTANEOUS DIRECT WRITING.—Mr. J. W. Caldwell, the Donato of the United States, informs the Banner of Light, April 4th, that at the camp meeting at Clinton, in 1883, he met Dr. Dobson, of Maquoketa, Iowa, who suggested that he should give a course of his lectures and demonstrations on magnetism, &c., in his district, and he did so. During his course of a fortnight, he was Dr. Dobson's guest. He found Dr. Dobson was a medium for the direct writing. He used to have sances: "On slates cleaned by myself," says Mr. Caldwell, "and held in any way I pleased, I received rapidly written messages, with the signatures of departed relatives known to none present but myself. Dr. Dobson told me that spirits could cause writing to come instantaneously, reminding him of the instantaneous process in photography. At the next sance I handed to him a slate, which I had cleaned, and on my putting a question he pushed two-thirds of it under the table-flap, and withdrew it almost instantaneously with four lines of writing on it. I sponged these off, and he again held it in the same manner, and after a pause of a fraction of a second drew it back with more writing on it this time than before. The experiment was repeated a dozen times: the messages differed, but the handwriting, firm and masculine, was the same in each."—Le Messenger.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXI.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

It is easy to see the bearing of faith-healing upon the recognition of Spiritualism. Miracles, in spite of Matthew Arnold and all the materialist Churchmen and philosophers, do happen. Grant the facts of faith-healing, and all that Spiritualists assert may be easily granted. This is our actual outlook to-day. Supernatural facts, or what are so considered, are reported in the leading journals.

I do not forget what the Times and Standard did for the Brothers Davenport, nor that Thackeray nearly wrecked the most popular of magazines by publishing a full account of one of Daniel Home's sances, by Robert Bell. But many things have happened since then. The daily Press has steadily ignored the scientific researches in Spiritualism of Crookes, Wallace, and Zollner, and now gives in to faith-healing! This is well—very well indeed!

Faith-cure, mind-cure, mesmerism—I do not much care how they explain the facts if they will only publish them. This is what we want, and all we want for Spiritualism. Describe the conditions and publish the facts. Only this is wanted. It tells the whole story, and every one may be left to draw his own conclusions. Such a thing was done under such conditions. Who, or what did it, is an inference from the facts. Give the facts and people can find their inferences.

For example, at one of the experiments of the Dialectical Society every person present knelt in his chair facing a large dining-table, on which he rested the tips of his fingers. The table rose in the air, and remained some moments suspended in space. The Times has had a leading article on the mind cure, a method of magnetism practised at Boston. The Daily Telegraph has published a report of a close half-column on the faith cures at the Agricultural Hall, at which 250 invalids on couches and in bathchairs were "anointed with oil in the name of the Lord," and resolutely prayed for. Wonders will never cease.

The Pall Mall Gazette gave the gist of the faith-healing enterprise in a briefer paragraph, but did not suppress the fact that when the time had been exhausted in hearing the testimonies of men and women miraculously cured—time being limited to three minutes for each—all who had not had this opportunity were asked to rise, and about 250 men and women stood up to witness to the faith-healing.

The intelligent action of invisible forces has proven, in short, what we call Spiritualism. The evidence that these intelligent forces are human personalities, in many cases well-known to us in this life—spirits nearest and dearest—is overwhelming. We see, hear, and feel them. They become as manifest to our senses as they ever did in life.

Spiritualism, then, is a body of inferences which we draw from a collection of facts, and is as much a science as astronomy or geology. The only difference is that we have learned to accept the facts of natural history, for example, on testimony, while we demand personal testimony as to the facts of Spiritualism. The doubting Thomases are in a large majority. They must touch, as well as see and hear, and even then find it hard to believe all their senses.

We welcome thought-reading, mesmerism, mind-cure, faith healing, any and every abnormality which will help people examine the supreme fact so thoroughly demonstrated in our time, the fact of spirit existence and power, the proofs of a life beyond the grave—a life which goes on and on, and which, according to the testimony of our spirit friends, is ever moving higher and higher in knowledge and happiness.

Faith cures may be the result of concentrated mesmeric action—a spiritual force we all exercise in some degree. The same mind-force or spiritual energy that acts on minds in revivals may act on bodies to restore energy and health. The fact remains that people are suddenly healed. The fact remains that we possess what we call spiritual powers. The Catholic Church, by its recognition of miracles, has continuously enjoyed them. When Protestants denied their possibility since the days of the Apostles, they made them impossible. They destroyed the faith, which has always been a necessary condition. The faith has come, and the miracles follow it. "According to your faith be it unto you."

If the Archbishop of Canterbury had as much faith as General Booth or the Bethshan leaders we might see miracles of healing in St. Paul's or Westminster Abbey. If our men and women of "light and leading" would investigate Spiritualism the whole aspect of society would be changed. Moral, intellectual, and material power would work together for social reformation, and "all things would work together for good." This is our outlook toward a near approaching future.

But our Christian friends must grow more tolerant, more charitable—well, more Christian. The low-class religious periodicals must rise to a higher level—moral and intellectual. For example, Mrs. McHardie should not have had the hardihood to get up in a meeting of the Christian Women's Union at Glasgow and declare that Spiritualism was not an imposture, but a fact which eminent scientific men had thoroughly verified, yet that it was Satanic—because "the spirits of the just never communicate with the living."

Now, who told Mrs. McHardie that? Does she not believe that the spirit of Samuel talked with Saul? Does she not believe that Moses and Elias were seen by the Disciples? Does she not believe in St. Paul's conversion? or the angels that released the Apostles from prison? The idea of any professed Christian denying that the spirits of the just ever communicate with the living! What of the "cloud of witnesses"? What of the "ministering spirits"? And the idea that we are all exposed to Satanic delusions, while our friends are not allowed to help us! It is too absurdly diabolical!

It appears that Mr. Watts, an English Secularist lecturer, has gone to America to take the place of Mr. Chainey, who has become a Spiritualist. But what if Mr. Watts should happen to attend a séance and get converted?—as every candid Secularist is liable to be. The doughty "Saladin," for example—the eloquent, poetical, utterly honest and dreadfully outspoken successor of Mr. Watts, as editor of the leading Secularist organ. Experience with any good medium would inevitably make "Saladin" a Spiritualist, and as he is too honest to "make believe," or make not believe, he would at once declare his newly-found knowledge. That would be a catastrophe.

On the whole, I hope "Saladin" will keep away from all mediums—give them a wide berth—until he has made an end of Mr. Bradlaugh, M.P., and Mrs. Besant, M.Q., and the author of the "Elements of Social Science." People must perform their proper functions. Mr. Bradlaugh's is to declare that there is no God and insist upon his right to assert His existence by a public appeal to Him in the House of Commons.

"Saladin" is, so far as I know, the first Secularist leader who has denounced the immoral teachings of some Secularist writers. His high poetic soul revolts against what he calls the "Cat-and-Ladleism" of the left wing of Secularism, and his conversion to Spiritualism just now would be disastrous; so we hope he will keep clear of Mr. Eglinton, Mr. Husk, and all the mediums until the other matter is settled.

Really, an out-and-out Secularist is far more likely to become a Spiritualist than any ordinarily bigoted Christian who holds that what he calls miracles ended with the Apostles. Every genuine Secularist is as open-minded as Mr. Gladstone to the examination of facts, and to their acceptance, the moment he has satisfactory evidence.

The Spiritual Offering, "devoted to the advocacy of Spiritualism in its religious, scientific, and humanitarian aspects," now in its eighth volume, is edited by Colonel and Mrs. Nettie Fox, and published at Ottumwa, Iowa. Among its contributors appear the names of leading Spiritualists in America. In the number just to hand we find those of Mrs. Richmond, at the present moment among us, Mr. Henry Kiddo, and Professor Loveland.

MR. G. J. ROMANES ON "MIND AND MOTION."

The Rede Lecture was delivered in the Senate-house, at Cambridge, by Mr. G. J. Romanes, M.A., F.R.S., before a large and distinguished audience, presided over by the Vice-Chancellor. Mr. Romanes entitled his lecture "Mind and Motion," and in it he discussed what we at present know concerning the relations between the external world of Nature and the internal world of mind. After giving some account of the teaching of Hobbes, who laid it down, on the one hand, that all our knowledge of the external world is but a knowledge of motion, and, on the other, that all our acquisitions of knowledge and other acts of mind imply some kind of "motion, agitation, or alteration, which worketh in the brain," he pointed out, as regards the internal world, that physiology has proved that molecular movements of nervous matter are concerned in all the processes of reflex action, sensation, perception, instinct, emotion, thought, and volition. The lecturer detailed the discoveries which of late years have been made by physiology concerning the rate at which these movements travel along nerves, the period of molecular vibrations in nerve centres, the time required for processes of thought, and the quantitative relations between brain-action and mind-action. When physiological instruments fail to take cognisance of these relations, we gain much additional insight touching the movements of nervous matter by attending to the thoughts and feelings of our own minds, for these are so many indices of what is going on in our brains. Proceeding to contemplate the mind, considered thus as a physiological instrument of the greatest delicacy, he argued that the association of ideas is but an obverse expression of the fact that when once a wave of molecular disturbance passes through any line of nerve structure, it leaves behind it a change in the structure, such that it is afterwards more easy for a similar wave when started from the same point to pursue the same course. Such being the intimate relation between brain-action and mind-action, it has become the scientifically orthodox teaching that the two stand to one another in the relation of cause to effect. He pointed out that the doctrine of conscious automatism is logically the only possible outcome of the theory that nervous changes are the causes of bodily changes, and, therefore, it cannot be fought on grounds of physiology. If we persist in regarding the relation between brain and thought exclusively from a physiological point of view, we must of necessity be materialists. But it does not follow from this that the theory of Materialism is true; and other considerations of an extra-physiological kind conclusively prove that the theory is false. We have, first, the general fact that all our knowledge of motion, and so of matter, is merely a knowledge of the modifications of mind. Therefore, so far as we are concerned, mind is necessarily prior to everything else. Thus the theory of Materialism assumes that one thing is produced by another thing, in spite of an obvious demonstration that the alleged effect is necessarily prior to its cause. But further, "motion produceth nothing but motion," says Hobbes, and yet he immediately proceeds to assume that in the case of the brain it produces, not only motion, but mind. Materialism has to meet the unanswerable question—How is it that the machinery of the brain motion produces this something which is not motion? Science has now definitely proved the correlation of all the forces, and this means that if any kind of motion could produce anything else that is not motion it would be producing what science would be bound to regard as in the strictest sense of the word a miracle; causation from brain to mind is in the strictest sense of the word a physical impossibility. Mutatis mutandis the theory of Spiritualism—which supposes causation to proceed from mind to body—is, he held, but little less unphilosophical than the opposite theory of Materialism. For just as it follows from the conservation of energy that motion can produce nothing but motion, so it equally follows that motion can be produced by nothing but motion. Is there, then, any third hypothesis in which we may hope to find intellectual rest? If we unite the elements both of Spiritualism and of Materialism, we obtain a product which satisfies every fact of feeling on the one hand, and of observation on the other. We have only to suppose that the antithesis between mind and motion, subject and object, is itself phenomenal or apparent, not absolute or real; that the seeming duality is relative to our modes of apprehension; and, therefore, that any change taking place in the mind and any corresponding change taking place in the brain are not really two changes, but one change. There is thus supposed to be only one stream of causation in which both motion and mind are simultaneously concerned; motion is supposed to be producing nothing but motion, mind-changes nothing but mind-changes. Both producing both simultaneously, neither could be what it is without the other, because without the other neither could be the cause which in fact it is. The use of mind to animals is thus explained, for intelligent volition is shown to be a true cause of bodily movement, seeing that the cerebration which it involves would not otherwise be possible. This monistic theory thus serves to terminate the otherwise interminable controversy on the freedom of the will; for the theory shows it to be merely a matter of terminology whether we speak of the mind or of the brain as the cause of bodily movement. That particular kind of physical activity which takes place in the brain could not take place without the occurrence of volition, and vice versa. All the requirements alike of the determinist and of the free-will hypotheses are thus satisfied by a synthesis which comprises them both in one. Mr. Romanes afterwards reviewed the opinions of the late Professor Clifford upon this subject, and concluded by observing that if it were true that the voice of science must of necessity speak the language of Agnosticism, at least let them see to it that the language was pure; let them not tolerate any barbarisms introduced from the side of aggressive dogma. So would they find that this new grammar of thought did not admit of any constructions radically opposed to more venerable ways of thinking, and that the often-quoted words of its earliest formulator applied with special force to its latest dialects—that if a little knowledge of physiology and a little knowledge of psychology incline men to Atheism, a deeper knowledge of both, and still more a deeper thought upon their relations to one another, could only lead men back to some form of religion, which, if it be more vague, will also be more worthy than that of earlier days.

At the close a vote of thanks to Mr. Romanes was accorded by acclamation.—The Times.

Mr. Eglinton and the Society for Psychical Research.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mr. Eglinton would have done well to obtain more trustworthy evidence in aid of his own inaccurate memory before undertaking to correct Mr. Hughes' statement in your issue of the 23rd ult., and before founding thereupon a general charge against the Society for Psychical Research.

In the first place, Mr. Hughes does not say anything about the "fifth séance"; he speaks of "five of the séances," and "the remaining one." This remaining one, which by no possible construction could be taken to be called "the fifth," was, as Mr. Eglinton says, the second of the series. It was held at my rooms on either the 15th or the 16th of January, and I was not present, having been obliged to leave town suddenly on the 15th January, owing to the death of a near relative. In consequence of this, the following séances, at which I was present, were held at Mr. Hughes' rooms.

If the results of this séance were so satisfactory as one or two of the sitters now seem to think, I should like to know why no report of it was ever prepared, and why the series was so soon discontinued?—Yours faithfully,

17, Osnaburgh-street,
6th June, 1885.

EDW. R. PEASE.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—On a more careful perusal of Mr. Hughes' letter in your issue of the 23rd ult., I find the sentence, "this statement is correct as regards five of the séances, but the remaining one was attended by good manifestations," capable of a different construction than that put upon it by me in your last issue. Mr. Hughes was no doubt speaking of the series en bloc, and, therefore, the "remaining one," which was the successful séance, may have been any one of the six. Under the circumstances I feel it only right to withdraw my remarks in regard to Mr. Hughes, which must be my reason for troubling you with this letter.

Having now the opportunity of referring to my diary, I find that Mr. Patterson is mistaken in saying Mr. Pease was present at the successful séance in question, but this does not alter the fact that he was well acquainted with the circumstances, of which he made no mention.—Yours truly,

G. Nottingham-place, W.

LORD BROUGHAM AND THE GHOST.

The following story is taken from the "Life and Times of Lord Brougham," written by himself:—In the first volume Lord Brougham says that after he left the High School of Edinburgh to go to the University, he had there a very intimate friend, Mr. G., and that in their lonely walks round Edinburgh and at other times they frequently discussed such subjects as the life hereafter, the immortality of the soul, and the possibility of spirits revisiting this earth and appearing to the living. They even went so far as to draw up an agreement, signed with their own blood, "that which died first should appear to the other, and thus solve any doubts entertained of the life after death."

Mr. G. went to India, and, after years had elapsed, Brougham had almost ceased to recollect that such a person existed, when one day near Christmas time—the 19th of December—when Brougham was taking a warm bath he happened to turn his eyes towards the chair on which his clothes were put, and there sat his old college friend G., looking him quietly and mournfully in the face. Lord Brougham swooned, and, when he came to, found himself lying on the floor of the bath-room. He made a note of the occurrence, thinking perhaps it was a dream, and yet, when he thought of the compact, believing that even in that case G. was probably dead, and that this appearance, whether dream or not, was to be looked on as an evidence of a future state. Sixty-three years afterwards Lord Brougham wrote the following words:—

"Brougham, October 16th, 1862.—I have just been copying out from my journal the account of this strange dream, certissima mortis imago (the undoubted semblance of death). Soon after my return there arrived a letter from India announcing G.'s death, and stating that he died on the 19th of December! Singular coincidence! Yet when one reflects on the vast number of dreams which night after night pass through our brains, the number of coincidences between the vision and the event are perhaps fewer and less remarkable than a fair calculation of chances would warrant us to expect."

FLORENCE MARRYAT has an interesting letter in the June number of the New York Beacon Light upon some very remarkable test materialisations through Mrs. Williams.

A SHILLING volume to be called "The Purpose of Theosophy," will be issued almost immediately by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. It is written by Mrs. A. P. Sinnett, and is designed to explain in a simple and popular way the nature of the movement to which the title refers.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND'S WORK IN ENGLAND.—The guides of Mrs. Richmond wish to announce that their medium will be at liberty to make engagements to speak in the provinces from July 12th until the middle of September. Letters to be addressed care of Mrs. Strawbridge, 11, Blandford-square, London, N.W.

A FIFTH edition of Mr. A. P. Sinnett's "Esoteric Buddhism," annotated and enlarged, has been published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall, the publishers of the same author's new novel "Karma," to whose hands the earlier work has now been transferred. Without altering the original text, which has been held by some authorities to represent the Esoteric doctrine of the East with accuracy as far as it goes, Mr. Sinnett has now expanded and interpreted his first exposition of the system.

CAMBERWELL ASSOCIATION OF INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM.—In connection with the above Association, it has been arranged to hold a meeting on Peckham Rye, on Sunday afternoon, at half-past three, when several friends have promised to assist. And in the evening at seven o'clock Mr. Robson has kindly promised to give an address at 81, Wells-street, Camberwell. The ordinary meetings are held in the rooms of the Association on Thursday evenings at 8.30, where "LIGHT" and works on Spiritualism can be had; and Mr. Price, Medical Mesmerist, treats patients by appointment.

SOUTH AMERICA.—There are two more centres now in Venezuela, says the Nueva Luz, from which the Spiritist doctrine is propagated, one near Calaboso, the other at San Francisco de Cara.—At Salvador, Doctor Antonio Pinheiro has been lecturing at the theatre on Spiritism with marked effect.—Le Spiritisme.

No. IV.

In dealing with any subject so vast as this, I must necessarily have been very superficial; and I do not doubt that many readers will at once complain that nothing said by me at all touches their own case. It must be so, I fear; the needs of humanity are infinitely various, and I cannot hope to touch more than a few of them. But I have found that what was given to me in answer to my own needs was, in a remarkable degree, applicable to others like circumstanced; so I hope that general remarks may find particular application here also.

The difficulties, first of all, vanish in face of a determined will, a persistent and unwearied desire for success; and they will yield to nothing less, save in those rare cases where no difficulties are felt, because they have been smoothed away by those unseen guardians who have need of the co-operation of a selected person, who is irresistibly impelled to action without conscious choice. Difficulties there are for most of us, but none insuperable, only they do not yield to a careless investigation on an idle evening when there is nothing better to do. They may, indeed, be prolonged, but I should be surprised to find that they were in any case insuperable. Penetrating beyond the threshold is a matter of more difficulty, and few care to do what the old occult writers were right in requiring—to sacrifice self altogether with all that that highest of abnegations involves.

The risks are principally of our own making. The ordinary methods in a promiscuous circle of approaching the world of spirit would seem to be devised for the very purpose of incurring the maximum of risk with the minimum of satisfaction. I hope the day is not far distant when we shall agree to abandon such ill-advised procedure. There is risk there, so grave that it can hardly be exaggerated. But for the evenly-balanced mind, not to be thrown off its balance by the unknown and unexpected, there is no risk greater than that which besets our ordinary life. The unbalanced intellect when tried then fails, as it would do elsewhere. The enthusiast raves; the vain-glorious vaunts himself exceedingly; all the over-developed instincts or passions become rife under unwonted stimulation. That is so, and must be so. But the even-minded, level-headed incurs no risk, and soon learns his best lessons from the discipline necessarily imposed upon him by an intercourse that demands his whole self-command and the exercise of the best qualities of his nature. I see that it has been said that some risk to physical health is inseparable from this investigation. I have no such experience or belief. I believe that a constant attendance on promiscuous circles is, especially for the medium, whose vital powers are used, gravely fraught with risk. But I know no such risk as attendant on the sane and well-ordered investigation of a reasonable man.

In concluding what I have written on the difficulties, dangers, and risks, which I do not wish to minimise, I desire to add some few words on the other aspect of the question. If there be risks, there are blessings; if difficulties, success is to be won. If we leave the individual and pass to the general, if we take a broad view of Spiritualism, and ask what it has done for human thought, we have no reason to fear the result of the inquiry. Taking the term in its widest acceptance as implying the inquiry into, or the knowledge of, the means of communion between this world and the world of spirit, with all that that communion carries with it, Spiritualism has already conferred upon us benefits that we are, perhaps, slow to recognise.

As a corporate organisation, its growth has been out of all proportion to that of any body that has preceded it. Its adherents—infinitely varying in minute shades of opinion, but of one accord in important matters—are numbered to an extent which no census can gauge in every country under Heaven. Even where open adherents are not found, secret belief obtains to an unknown extent. Even when no special profession of faith has been made, the belief of the Spiritualist has permeated the thinking classes, especially in respect of matters of religious faith. It has made, for instance, the old idea of God obsolete and repulsive, eternal fire a savage myth, and the hard literal interpretation of the Scriptures a crude and childish folly. It has refined, spiritualised, and elevated our conceptions. If it be contended that they would have been elevated any way by the progress of human thought, I am not concerned to deny it. I only say that Spiritualism has been one of the expressions of the progress of human thought. I do not believe in any progress of that kind apart from the inspiration of spirit.

More than all, it has cut at the very root of dogmatism and intolerance. It has taught a man to think aloud, to have the courage of his opinions, and to leave to others the responsibility for theirs; to lend an attentive ear to whatever of new truth may come from whatever unlikely source, and to cherish with loving veneration whatever of the old truth man has spared in spite of his theological systems.

Most of all, perhaps, it has made religion a matter of daily life to those who before regarded it as a thing for high days and holidays. For if a man makes his future by the acts and habits of his daily life, how should he not live always as in the very presence of death? This, in Eastern phraseology, is in part the doctrine of Karma—the accretion in the earth-life of an individuality which will survive the dissolution of the personality, and which will determine its own future state by the action of inexorable law. If this idea be once grasped as an energising factor in the daily life, most else may contentedly be left alone. Blessed would be the man whose acts were so governed! Blessed the State whose citizens were actuated by such potent motives!

GERMANY.—A Spiritualist paper, under the title of Spiritische Wochenblatt, appears at Rostock. It proposes to synthesise German national Spiritualism. While recognising many good things in its pages, we perceive that the editors disregard the strict neutrality proper to science, and give expression to certain clerical tendencies which confer a sectarian character upon their publication.—At Schoenigen, M. Abraham, who, like Cumberland, rejoices in a borrowed catching name, his being Bellini, has been drawing money by announcing himself as an exposé of mediumship. A Spiritualist, M. Zencker, got him to accept a challenge to imitate the phenomena occurring with a medium named Schrappe. "Bellini," bound in the same manner as the medium, unable to extricate himself, stuck fast piteously to his chair.—Le Spiritisme.

ON EVIDENCE FOR INDEPENDENT MIND-ACTION IN PSYCHOGRAPHY.

By D. H. WILSON, M.A.

The following is an account (written immediately after they were concluded) of some experiments in psychography, made with the medium, Mr. W. Eglinton, at his rooms, 11, Langham-street, London, W., on Monday, January 5th, 1885.

The séance, held in the daylight, commenced at three o'clock in the afternoon. There were present, besides myself, my wife, and the medium, one other person only, namely, my sister, Mrs. Arthur Kimber, of 3, Roland-gardens, South Kensington, S. W.

After having obtained writings within Mr. Eglinton's Brahma-locked slate, in answer to a question written by myself, secretly, therein, and also within Mrs. Wilson's own book-slate, and after having obtained a large slateful of writing in about ten seconds, whilst the slate was on the top of the table within view of all present—phenomena familiar to most of your readers—the medium suggested an experiment to prove that the intelligence displayed in the writing was outside of the knowledge of the experimenters. It was this: He gave us four strips of clean note-paper. Upon two of these Mrs. Wilson and Mrs. Kimber wrote two questions (secretly), folded up the papers, and handed them to me. I wrote (secretly) two questions on the other two strips, folded them up, and shuffled all the four pieces of paper together in my hands underneath the table, and then Mrs. Wilson withdrew one of them at hazard, and placed it on a clean slate with a small crumb of pencil. The medium, who up to this moment from the commencement of the experiment had been standing before the window with his back to all of us, approached the table, and raising the said slate with the thumb and forefinger of his right hand, held it, jointly with Mrs. Kimber, under, and close against the flap of the table. The sound of writing was heard at once. When it ceased Mr. Eglinton handed me the slate, on which appeared by the side of the strip of paper the word "Monday," in answer to my question contained in that strip, "What day is it to-day?"

It should be noted that:—

1. The medium, from first to last, did not touch for an instant any of the papers after we had written upon them.
2. Only one person (myself) knew that the question answered had been put.
3. None knew what question the paper drawn by Mrs. Wilson at hazard contained.
4. The answer Monday was written on the upper surface of the slate, on which rested also the chosen strip of paper. The crumb of pencil used had been previously marked by myself for the purpose of identification, and before the experiment had sharp facets, which afterwards were slightly worn; the said crumb of pencil rested on the last stroke of the "y" of the word Monday, and the writing, as in all our previous experiments, was upside down, in relation to the position of the medium.

It will occur to the reader that this experiment, so far as it was intended to prove that the knowledge shown in the psychographic phenomenon was not derived from the minds of the experimenters, was not complete. Although no one present—no one in the world—knew what question the paper chosen contained when it was being answered, yet one of us, myself, had been conscious of that question a few moments previously. In other words, the inquiry originated in the mind of one of the four individuals who took part in the experiments.

Mr. Eglinton kindly offering to try any further experiments to demonstrate the action of an independent (that is a fifth) mind, I suggested that we should endeavour to obtain by psychography an extract from a closed book. Accordingly Mrs. Kimber wrote on a slate the number of a page; Mrs. Wilson the number of a line, and it remained for me to choose the book from which Mrs. Wilson's line of Mrs. Kimber's page was to be written by psychography on the slate. For this purpose, with closed eyes, I took a book from the medium's shelves, which held about 200 volumes. A crumb of pencil was placed upon the slate on which Mrs. Kimber and Mrs. Wilson had written the number of the page and line respectively. A second slate of exactly the same size and form was placed over this one, and the book was put by myself on the top of the two slates. Mr. Eglinton and Mrs. Kimber rested their hands on the book.

It should be noted that:—

1. Precaution had been taken that no one besides Mrs. Kimber knew what number she had written on the slate to express the page to be recited, the same being true of the number Mrs. Wilson had written to express the line of that page.
2. The slates and the book were on the top of the table immediately before the eyes of all present.
3. Until I had placed the book upon the slates no one could have known what volume had been taken from the shelves. The medium did not touch the book until the moment when he and Mrs. Kimber rested their hands thereon. It had been handled by myself alone, and I was particularly careful neither to open it nor to look at its title.
4. Neither Mrs. Kimber, Mrs. Wilson, nor myself have the slightest recollection of ever having seen or heard of the said work, which was "Ghose's Indian Chiefs, Rajahs, &c. Part II."

After the lapse of a few seconds the sound of writing was heard within the slates. Upon the usual signal of three taps (also seemingly within the slates), to indicate the end of the experiment, I examined the slates, and found the following sentence, written on the under one, with the pencil resting on the full-stop at the end. (I may mention here that all the writings throughout the entire séance were conscientiously punctuated, and that every t was crossed and every i dotted.)

Mrs. Kimber had written 199, and Mrs. Wilson 14.

I then opened the book and turned to page 199, which commences thus:—

"Table A. Estates belonging to the Hon. Maharaja Jotundra Mohun Tagore Behadur," &c.

This experiment closed the séance. Does it prove the action of an independent—of a fifth mind?

As such a test, it seems to have this weak point, namely, that the book belonged to the medium, and had probably been read by him. It can scarcely be supposed that he remembered the fourteenth line of the 199th page in the sense that he could have reproduced it at will. How then, assuming it to have been at one time a part of his consciousness, and since nothing is lost, at the time of the experiment, a fact lurking in the storehouse of his memory, how, by what process was that little unimportant fact revived?

We are reminded of the mainsprings whereby latent thoughts are revived. There is (1) the principle of association of ideas, (2) there is volition, (3) there is that acquisition of energy which the reproductive faculty displays in certain abnormal states of nervous excitement.

1. In the experiment before us how could association be a reproducing agent? "199 page, line 14," suggests nothing. When we read a book we don't read the numbers of the pages, and count the lines of each page. Yet we must suppose the line lying latent in Mr. Eglinton's mind, duly labelled with the proper number and page. This is supposing too much. We admit that whatever a person reads that may lurk in his mental storehouse to the end of his life, but we cannot admit that the numbers of every line on each page of every book he reads enter that storehouse at all. He cannot, therefore, give out what he does not possess.

What association of ideas can be set in train by "page 199, line 14"? This inquiry reminds us of what can be nothing more than a coincidence, namely, that the last word of the fourteenth line was a cipher, which (regarded as a numerical figure) is the class of association one would expect from figures 199, 14, 0, belonging, as it were, to the same family. But it is merely a coincidence, for psychography told us that on that page was "a table" (singularly enough Table 4).

2. If the latent thought were revived by volition (as happens when we tell another our name and address), it would come into the field of consciousness. Mr. Eglinton denies any conscious revival.

3. That there is present in the medium some abnormal excitement during the occurrence of these psychographic phenomena there can be no doubt. Of the causes of this excitement we are very ignorant, but it may be remarked that inasmuch as the effects seem to be simply muscular and nervous, neither exciting nor depressing the mind of the subject, this phenomenon cannot well be classed with those well-established facts where the most remotely hidden memories flash into consciousness in states of rare cerebral excitement, for at such times there is always great mental disturbance, bordering and often entering upon, delirium. In conclusion, I cannot speak too well of Mr. Eglinton's disposition to assist me in my investigation of the remarkable phenomena attending his mediumship. He takes an intelligent interest in his work, and deserves gratitude and encouragement of all serious students of this profound and important subject.

Rosemont, Hyères (Var), France.

27th May, 1885.

THE special correspondent of the Daily Chronicle of Tuesday, June 1st, in giving a very graphic account of the funeral of Victor Hugo, is pleased to be funny in describing a deputation of Spiritualists that followed the veteran poet's funeral as being a "singular feature" in the procession. We, in turn, might consider it "singular" if such a deputation had not attended the last rites of our companion in belief. From advices received from Paris, we understand that the leading Spiritualists were represented in the general ceremony by special permission.

INCIPIENT MEDIUMSHIP.—The Revue Spirite has a letter from a well-known correspondent with respect to a case of incipient mediumship previously alluded to in the Revue. "At Esnandes, near Rochelle," he writes, "lives a cultivator, Savineau, with wife and two daughters, the elder, Alexandrine, thirteen years old, an invalid from birth. She was, last January, laid up with bronchitis. One evening as she lay still in bed, scratchings of the bedclothes were heard. These scratchings came every evening. Then she felt blowings and touchings on the face; then pinchings of her arms; the bed-curtains were sometimes shaken as if by a hand, which she said she saw; then loud raps sounded on the wooden partition. As these phenomena increased in strength and frequency, she became weaker, although the bronchitis was leaving her. For a change she was conveyed to the house of a relative in an adjoining village, and remained a short time. The phenomena accompanied her thither, continued, and returned with her. People from all parts visit the house and send accounts to the papers. I went March 15th. I found Alexandrine an interesting girl of amiable character. In talking she has twitchings of the left side of her face, her pupils are dilated, and her sight is weak. I made some passes over her face, and produced a pricking sensation, and her eyes began to close; but I withheld from prosecuting magnetic treatment, because the room was crowded and there were many gazing in at the windows. On the 23rd I went again, and ascertained that the phenomena were caused by a spirit. In answer to questions, rappings were heard away from Alexandrine, and I observed that they were less sonorous in proportion to their distance from her."—A. VINCENT.

NEW FEATURES AT MR. EGLINTON'S SEANCES.

Another séance, held a few days since by a friend and myself, again with Mr. Eglinton, was so interesting from the many different phenomena developed, that I send it you for a place in your valuable journal.

My friend had never before attended a slate-writing séance with Mr. Eglinton, though she is an experienced Spiritualist. The heavy weather, we feared, would be unfavourable for the sitting. However, the power appeared to be strong. The medium was rapidly controlled. We wrote questions on the slates (carefully concealing them from the medium) as to the spirits who were present, and the names of several deceased friends were given in reply; also some remarks, in which the words "two weeks" were mentioned in answer to a question. The number being illegible, the figure 2 was substituted. I then privately wrote a request to have some information from a spirit present concerning a departed mutual relation, whose life had been an eventful one. Mr. Eglinton held the slates at first under the flap of the table, but writing being delayed, he raised them over my head, when the pencil commenced moving rapidly. The slates were then placed on my shoulder, the writing continuing, and the medium supporting the slates with one hand. Pauses, and a difference in the movements of the pencil, showed that two controls were at work. On the signal being given, we found writing in a rather large hand, commencing on one side of the slate, carried in several lines round and round it, leaving a small space in the centre. The large writing informed us that the heavy atmosphere caused difficulties in communication, and also made it difficult for the "guides" to bring our friends to us in proper sequence. The small space in the centre was filled with a communication from my sister, and signed with her name. She left earth-life many years ago as a child of seven years old. This writing was small and delicate. My previous question had remained unanswered until now. Mr. Eglinton became much agitated, being apparently painfully controlled, and a reply was written identifying the spirit referred to in my inquiry. The medium now said a vision was coming upon him. Closing his eyes he slowly described a scene in the early life of the lady in question, which was at once recognised as true by my friend and myself. Still holding my hand, Mr. Eglinton became more and more agitated, at the same time describing the unhappy state of the lady in some part of her earth-life. He begged me not to concentrate my thoughts on her too much, as he felt efforts were being made to entrance him, which he resisted. He rose from his seat and paced the room in great apparent suffering and agitation. His left arm began moving convulsively, and suddenly he sat down, begging I would hold fast his right hand, saying, "Look! look! The lady is trying to show you her name on the back of my hand!" His left hand was now clenched on the table. We could see nothing at first on the back of this hand, but presently faint red lines began to appear, rising, as it were, under the skin, growing darker by degrees, until the, to me, well-known name of the lady—not a very common one—appeared distinctly complete. After remaining for a few seconds for our inspection, the letters faded away. The medium being now relieved from this control, held the slates again under the table-flap for writing, his right hand still holding my left. I was now patted several times on knees and wrist by invisible fingers, Mr. Eglinton laughingly exclaiming that he was also patted. My companion now changed places with me, on which the medium, turning to her, described a gentleman who wished to communicate, and gave her a verbal message from this spirit, a deceased relation, on a subject which had greatly occupied her mind. After this the "patting" recommenced on our wrists and arms. My friend's handkerchief was taken several times from her lap, and at length appeared on the opposite side of the room. Materialised hands now made their appearance from under the edge of the table. They were of different forms. One appeared close to me, sitting as I was far from Mr. Eglinton. He and my friend described it as a "long-fingered one," and I was told by the medium it was that of my son. This was immediately confirmed by strong raps on the floor in a different part of the room, which continued for some time, and by which I held a conversation on some family matters. Mr. Eglinton's left hand during these occurrences continued to hold the slates, while his right hand was grasped by my companion. The phenomena throughout this séance were rapidly produced, with great power, but it is difficult to describe the continuous occurrence of characteristic communications on family and private matters, which could not but convince us of the identity of our spirit friends. The séance was held in full light throughout.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

The sixth meeting of the present session of this Society was held on the 3rd inst. The subject was the Symbolism of the Old Testament, and was introduced by Mr. Edward Maitland in a paper of which the following is an abstract.

The question of the value of the historical element in Christianity involves that of the intention and significance of the New Testament and especially of the Gospels. But as this is but a portion of the Scriptures represented by Christianity, the question cannot be determined without first ascertaining the real nature of the Old Testament,—how far it is historical, and how far allegorical or mystical. For it follows from the relation between these two divisions of the Bible that whatever is the character of the one that must be also the character of the other. So that if the one be exclusively historical, exclusively mystical, or a combination of the two characters, the other also must be so.

To define these terms. If the expressions in the Bible which denote persons, places, times, and events, really refer to these in the ordinary sense, and make this sense the primary and essential one, then the Bible is historical. If, on the contrary, the expressions in question do not refer to these in the ordinary sense, but make this sense a secondary and subordinate one, and refer really and primarily to principles, processes, and states which are not physical and phenomenal, but spiritual and noumenal, and make this the real and essential sense, then the Bible is not historical but mystical, and is rightly understood only when so interpreted.

There are four different sources of information whereby a judgment on this question may be formed. (1) The Bible itself; (2) the consensus of qualified commentators; (3) the general usage in corresponding cases; and (4) the intrinsic nature of the case, growing out of the purpose and nature of revelation and religion. The result of an examination of all these grounds of judgment—particulars of which were given in the paper—is to show beyond possibility of doubt (1) that the Bible, while containing an historical element, is really mystical in its intention, in that it uses historical and other phenomenal incidents merely as symbols to denote mystical truths; and (2) that it could not, from the nature of the case, be otherwise without forfeiting its character as a Bible; since religion is necessarily, by virtue of its interior and spiritual character, addressed, not to the senses, but to the soul. So that, were the Bible historical in the sense ordinarily ascribed to it, it would have no message to the souls of men.

The failure to understand the Bible has come of a confusion of planes on the part of its readers, and their consequent ascription to the physical plane of that which belongs to, and is intended for, the spiritual. To understand this, it is necessary to consider, besides the nature of religion, the method of the mystics who were the writers of the Bible and formulators of religion.

As with the hieroglyphs of Egypt—the land from which the Bible has its derivation—the symbols employed were one and all drawn from the natural or physical world. This was for two reasons: one because its writers recognised as subsisting between the two worlds—or states, for there is no question of locality—a correspondence in virtue of which whatever exists materially and phenomenally in the one is the counterpart of, or correspondent to, something which subsists spiritually and noumenally in the other. From which it follows that the terms which denote the one class of objects, serve also to denote the other. And all that is necessary to avoid confusion is to remember which of the two worlds, or states, is the one intended.

The other reason for representing the subjects of spiritual cognition by terms derived from the natural world is because we first have cognisance of the natural, and only through our perceptions of its objects can we have any comprehension of things spiritual.

On the same principle the name of some object is used to denote, not the object itself, but its distinguishing characteristic; and this, again, as subsisting, not in the object in question, but in the world specially intended. From which it comes that when the term employed is, say, the name of some animal, it is not the animal itself that is meant, nor the characteristic as subsisting in the animal and for the sake of which it was chosen, but the corresponding mode or quality in the spiritual world.

Such is the method pursued in all mystical Scriptures. And they are called mystical because they relate to things interior and hidden, and require an interior faculty for their apprehension; and also because of the duty of preserving silence concerning them in regard to persons who, being unable to appreciate them, might, after the manner of the ignorant and unperceptive, ridicule and profane them. The term mystery, which is cognate with mystic, does not properly imply beyond or contrary to understanding, as it has become usual to suppose. It implies only that which transcends the lower faculties and requires a transcendental, but not therefore superhuman, faculty for its cognition.

The famous Swedish seer had done excellent service in recovering and formulating the ancient canon of mystical interpretation. It is true that Swedenborg did not himself remember always to observe the rule laid down by him, and that he fell in consequence into some grievous errors. But the rule is none the less valid on that account. "To take the literal meaning of the Word for the true one is," he says, "to destroy the truth itself, since everything in the Word relates to the heavenly and spiritual, and becomes falsified when transferred to a lower level by being taken literally." (T. C. R., 358.) "In the internal sense there is no respect to any person, or anything determined to a person. But there are three things which disappear from the sense of the letter of the Word when the internal sense is unfolded: namely, that which is of time, that which is of place, and that which is of person." (A.C., 52, 53.)

The same rule is largely insisted on in "The Perfect Way," where it is shown further that the exaltation of the letter and form, that is of the historical and phenomenal element in the Bible, in place of the spirit and substance, constitutes the sin most severely reprobated in the Bible, namely, idolatry. It is not the use of symbols which exposes men to the charge of idolatry, but the failure to assign to these their spiritual and proper significance. The rule is that no interpretation of a religious dogma or other symbol is true which has a physical application; and, so long as it seems to us to bear such an application, we have not yet found the true meaning. All in it that is true is for spirit alone.

This exposition of the principles of mystical interpretation was followed by several examples of allegorical narrative in the Old Testament, showing in every case the spiritual and real, as distinguished from the literal and apparent meaning. Among the narratives dealt with were those of the Creation and Fall; the mystic "Woman" of Scripture; Enoch; the Deluge, and the Exodus. The wars and other actions of the Israelites, which, if literally intended, would be in the highest degree discreditable to themselves and their Deity—were shown to be symbolical of the conflict which man must wage against his own evil propensities and other limitations, in order to attain the perfectionment of the final regeneration which it is the object of the Bible to exhibit as the means and condition of salvation. A really literal translation would show that the names of various persons and places denoted, not persons and places at all, but qualities and properties related to the various states of the soul, precisely as in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Holy War." The mystical meaning of the Exodus was explained as follows:—

One of the chief stumbling-blocks of the school of literalists has been the apparent failure of the prophecies asserting positively the return of the Israelites into captivity in Egypt, since they never did go back into that country. But according to the mystical interpretation, no such failure occurred, nor can there be a failure of Divine prophecy. Egypt was a symbol for materiality, whether as the world or as the body. And Israel was a term denoting all who, being possessed of the spiritual consciousness, have attained their true majority and become, in the mystical sense, men. The soul's lapse from its proper high estate of pure spirituality is thus always, whether for the individual or the general, a "going down into Egypt." And although it is necessary for the soul's due unfoldment and the building up of the man, that the individual have experiences of the body and acquire the lessons it has to teach; it is necessary always to guard against becoming so deeply sunk in materiality as to lose altogether the consciousness of things spiritual, and become "a bond-slave in the land of Egypt," and past hope of redemption therefrom.

Read by this light, the story of the Bondage and Exodus acquires a significance at once new and profound, and an interest universal and eternal, such as could belong to no merely historical incident, whatever may have been the nucleus of physical fact which suggested the allegory. For, thus read, the going down into Egypt for corn becomes the birth of the soul into the body as at once a nursery, a school, a house of correction, and a chamber of ordeal. The taskmasters are the fleshly senses and appetites, to yield oneself up to which is to become a bond-slave. The plagues are the sufferings undergone by the body as a penalty for its detention of the soul, and provoke in the latter a desire to escape. The Red Sea is at once the water of cleansing and the way of deliverance: the means also of death to the lower nature. The magian's rod is the purified will; the pursuing Pharaoh, his horsemen and chariots, are the bodily affections seeking to bring the soul back under their dominion; the wilderness beyond is the way of the cross of renunciation; the guiding pillar of fire and cloud is the understanding of Divine things; and the Promised Land is the final state of rest and perfection, attaining to which the man—now become regenerate—can exclaim, "Out of Egypt hast Thou called Thy son."

Such, to mystical apprehension, is the one theme of the Bible, repeated again and again under every form of allegory, the verification of which lies within the souls of all those who have attained to the consciousness thereof.

Many Fellows and visitors joined in the discussion which followed, and which was of the highest interest and importance.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.—The discourse on "Material and Spiritual Portents" was delivered as announced, last Sunday evening, at the Kensington Town Hall. The address was remarkable for the broadness of its views and the touching sympathy of its tone. It was well adapted to respond to the interest awakened by the signs and portents of the times. It was stated that a new and important epoch of the world's history had now commenced. The old dispensation had closed in 1881. The solar system had commenced another cycle. A conjunction of planets had taken place causing important changes in the condition of matter, its attractions and magnetisms. Changes would ensue in the mental and spiritual spheres. Daily events portended a change—physical disturbances of the earth's surface; movements political and social among nations; discoveries in science; new tenets in philosophy; the overthrow of cherished religious dogmas. Some philosophers held that physical changes influenced man's mental condition; others that the mental condition influenced matter. As man became more perfected so would material conditions advance. When harmony prevailed, then even the wild and noxious beasts must change their nature, and become attuned to the new order of things and become tame. We should prepare ourselves for the coming advent, like as the mariner prepares his vessel to weather the threatening storm, or as the desert traveller is forewarned by the clouded streak on the horizon, or the mountaineer notes the rumbling of the distant avalanche. Though the change may not be accompanied by bloodshed or violent perturbation, still it will be most portentous in the world's history. Old dogmas and beliefs will be rudely shaken, a new religion will arise, embodying only the fundamental truths of older religious beliefs, founded on the immutable principles of love to others and unselfishness. We shall realise that in our midst there exists an unseen world of spirits ever helping and guiding us here in life. That none are so low or unfortunate but that some sympathising spirit is ever near, watching to approach, to elevate and heal. The man of genius will not be proud of his gifts, but rather regard himself as the humble instrument of the Divine sent to instruct others. The rich will assist the poor; the happy will console the dejected; the wise will teach the uneducated. After the address an impromptu poem was given on "Inspiration, and from whence it comes." The subject of the address, next Sunday evening will be "Spiritualism, Christianity, Buddhism, and Orientalism: their Relation to the New Religion."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By M.A. (Oxon.)

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct sances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential; and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful sance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitching of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous, and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ANATOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Najder, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambule,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROMWELL F. VAILEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerbf, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

MIASMA OF SIN.

"Let no man be deceived as if the contagions of the soul were less than those of the body. They are yet greater, they convey more direful diseases; they sink deeper."—PETRARCH.

St. Martin being once asked whether he believed in revenans—ghosts, "those who return"—made this reply: "Je ne crois pas aux revenans, mais aux restans." This bon-mot of the philosopher's is peculiarly applicable to our present purpose, namely, to consider the crowding around our abodes and the daily haunts of men of a class of haunting spirits who are not those who return, but those who remain, and have never, in fact, gone away.

To the "sensitive," the "clairvoyant," and the "medium," forced by the necessities of their daily existence—and how many such now are found amongst the toilers for bread!—to labour and to dwell in great cities, this class of earth-bound spirits, still congregating like a thick atmosphere around their former places of resort, becomes a curse and a burden intolerable. The class of spirits of which we speak forms the very dregs of the spirit-spheres, so coarse and so heavy that they have never been able to rise, nor apparently have ever even felt any desire to rise, out of the sphere of their own former low earthly life. Heavily, "of the earth earthy," to earth, and the coarse things of sensuous existence, they ever gravitate. This class of degraded spirits, those persons whose spiritual eyes, ears, and senses have been quickened to a painful recognition of their presence, unhesitatingly unite in regarding as an occult force clearly in persistent operation upon man for infinite degradation, misery, and despair. Until men and women of all classes of society become fully alive to the danger arising from this miasma of spirit—for these restans fill the air wherever humanity congregates in masses together, their gravitation being towards humanity, and not to the spirit-spheres—little hope can there be of any true advancement in social regeneration. Healthful bodies, wherein dwell—not fitfully, but consistently—quiet, well-ordered, and Heaven-aspiring minds, are the only armour which can protect from the ceaseless assaults of these enemies, since these vampire spirits seek to draw from humanity alone their life, and not from God.

It may be urged that the consideration of this side of spirit-revelation is unclean, and consequently that it may be best to pass it over in silence—to walk on the other side of the street, as it were, when you smell a bad and pestilence-engendering stench from a drain—and so ignore it. May it not be better, smelling the drain powers, to seek such means as lie in our power to have its impurities removed? "It is unclean," exclaims Epes Sargent, with the courage of true benevolence. "But so is leprosy. And the man who studies it to allay the sufferings of his fellows, must be honoured rather than blamed."

It is in this spirit, therefore, that we present to the thoughtful reader the following extracts and experiences, leaving them to work upon him through their own moral teaching.

"Earth-bound spirits," says Dr. Eugene Crowell in his work, "The Spirit World and its Inhabitants,"* "infest our public conveyances, steamboats, &c.; they frequent the lowest quarters of our cities; and low dance houses, liquor saloons, brothels, gambling saloons, &c., are crowded with them. They subsist mostly on the emanations from earthly food. Restaurants and kitchens, especially when unclean, are resorted to by them when hungry, they also frequent hotels and private houses, where rich and luxurious repasts are habitually served, and inhale the odours and impalpable elements arising from these. Some attach themselves to gluttonous persons who are mediumistic, and are able to abstract the more sublimated and vitalising elements of the food from their victims as fast as it is swallowed, and thus a morbid appetite is created which impels the person to continued and extraordinary efforts to satisfy it. He really is eating for two persons, one of whom is invisible. Such spirits are veritable vampires. Liquor saloons are crowded with this class of spirits, and not a person who possesses medial power in any degree—and most persons possess it in some degree—there moistens his lips with wine or liquors, who is not at once obsessed by miserable degrading spirits, and by them urged—often irresistibly—to further indulgence, until, as it frequently happens, the victim becomes prostrated by the demon of drunkenness, with, perhaps, the obsessing spirit lying equally unconscious and helpless at his side. These remarks, slightly modified, are also applicable to gambling saloons and brothels. Could the frequenters of these abodes of sin and evil have their spiritual eyes opened, as were the eyes of the servant of Elisha, they would rush with horror from such scenes. . . . And not only are these earth-bound spirits attracted by the odours and emanations from our food, which nourish their grosser natures, but another reason why they frequent the scenes of their earthly life is the necessity, probably not recognised by themselves, of obtaining that spiritual or vital nourishment which they are deficient in, and which they find in the atmosphere of mortals. This craving of their natures brings them into rapport with mortals on their own moral and spiritual planes, and their evil influence is felt, and frequently becomes manifest, in these classes of persons, and many times they are attracted and attach themselves to persons on higher planes, who, though not actually given to evil practices, yet are not earnestly opposed to them, and are reduced to the level of their tempters. The fall of such persons would frequently be prevented were they to know and to realise that they also have good spirit friends around them who would effectually assist them if they would only welcome them, and by their prayers and desires strengthen their hands, so that they could put to flight these dark and degraded spirits."

Regarding this legion of evil influences and the sole armour which can protect man against its baleful magic, wise words will be found in the "Spirit Teachings" of "M. A. (Oxon.)."

"If man has chosen," says Imperator, "to attract by his evil mind and evil life congenial spirits who aggravate his wickedness, on his head be the sin. They have but tended the crop which he has already sown. He was mad already: mad in neglect of his own spirit and body: mad in that he has driven far from him the holy influences. Far more mad, indeed, are those besotted drunkards whom you deem not mad. To spirit-eye there is no more fearful sight than those dens of wickedness and impurity where evil men gather to steep their senses in oblivion, to excite the lustful and sensual passions of their debased bodies, to consort with the degraded and the impure, and to offer themselves the ready prey of the basest and worst spirits who hover around and find their gratification in living over again their bodily lives."

"What do you mean by living over again their base lives?"

"These earth-bound spirits retain much of their earthly possessions and propensity. The cravings of the body are not extinct, though the power to gratify them is withdrawn. The drunkard retains his old thirst, but exaggerated: aggravated by the impossibility of slaking it. It burns within him, and urges him to frequent the haunts of his old vices, and to drive wretches like himself to further degradation. In them he lives again his old life, drinks in satisfaction; grim and devilish, from the excesses which he causes them to commit. And so the vice perpetuates itself, and swells the crop of sin and sorrow."

Page 23 and again p. 40, "Imperator" observes, with reference to the excesses of the Derby Day:—

"The spirits who are antagonistic are massed together in great force whenever any occasion is offered for them to operate successfully on men who are gathered together for the purposes of gratifying their bodily passions. Yesterday there were vast masses whose passion of cupidity was excited to an enormous degree. They were the point of attack from similar spirits," &c.

These extracts from the writings of men of eminence in the psychological movement cannot fail to carry weight with them.

It remains but to observe that there lies now before the writer of this appeal to the conscience of every thoughtful reader the MS. diary of a worker for daily bread in London.

The experiences therein contained are of a nature too dreadful to be given to an unprepared public. They are the experiences of a "sensitive" of a highly-developed order of clear-seeing; of a person, so to speak, possessed of a double life and of a double eye-sight; the things of the external life, and the things of the inner life of the spirit, being discerned by this person with an almost equal intensity.

The revelations of this diary are in entire accord with the above given extracts. Had not this martyr to the social ignorances, selfishnesses, and ingrained lusts of this "City of the Many Sins" builded around the inner life a bulwark of innocence, through a life of prayer, of self-denial, of strictest temperance both in eating and drinking, being both a vegetarian and an abstainer from all alcoholic beverages, the battle against evil influences of the most malign nature could never have been successfully waged. Truly the life of such a martyr is heroism indeed! No greater Inferno than London, when thus unveiled, could be conceived or painted by the genius of a Dante, the seven deadly sins in multiform embodiment lying in wait at every turn to strangle the souls, corrupt the spirits of men, and fill their bodies with the baleful miasma of sin.

Such sights must have been revealed in old Jerusalem to the clairvoyant vision of the holy Christ when He wept over her, exclaiming, "If thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! But now they are hid from thine eyes!" SALVATION THROUGH PURITY, and "the things which belong to" that "peace," alas! are assuredly hidden from the eyes of the dwellers in our modern great cities, who are ever pertinaciously "drawing death into themselves" by their life in death. What has been here stated is simple truth without any exaggeration. A. M. H. W.

WE regret to announce the death of the young Prince of Thirm and Taxis, which took place on the 2nd inst. The deceased, who was a nephew of the Empress, had for many years past been a devoted Spiritualist, and the Austrian Court and society in general have been much grieved by the sad event. We hear that the Empress, on learning his hopeless state, hastened to his bedside and remained with him to the last.

SPIRITUALISM IN A COURT OF LAW.

The Spiritual Offering of May 16th reports the prosecution, in the Court of Criminal Correction, at St. Louis, of Mr. and Mrs. Miller, mediums, by Messrs. Johnson and Madden, on the charge of defrauding them of a dollar and a-half, price of admission to a séance. The court was occupied with the case from April 28th to May 7th, when it held the defendants under bond to answer the charge, should the jury find a true bill against them.

The Spiritual Offering invites attention to the testimony of the principal witness for the defence, Judge Portis. We compress within the limits of our space his answers to the main questions put to him.

The Spiritual Offering informs its readers that Judge Portis is a lawyer of thirty years' standing; has long resided in St. Louis, and has exercised public functions; he was legal adviser of the Pacific railroad, and holds the same office now on the Missouri Pacific. He has attended many of the séances of Mr. and Mrs. Miller at various houses, as well as at their own, for nearly four years. On Judge Portis' entering the witness-stand, the counsel for the defence put the question:—

Is the court to understand, Judge Portis, that you are a believer in Spiritualism?—Yes, sir. I have been a believer in Spiritualism, as I understand it, for fifteen years.

What do you mean by your understanding of it?—Spiritualism, as I understand it, demonstrates that what is called death is but a change into another state of life; that we continue in that until we die out of it, to be changed into a still higher one; and so on to infinity. This is one of the teachings I have received from Spiritualism; another is the Universal Fatherhood of God, Motherhood of Nature, and Brotherhood of Mankind; the term Universal Brotherhood includes, as I understand, spirits who have passed out of, as well as those still in, the body, for one of the teachings is that we are as much spirits now as we ever shall be; that we now occupy a physical organism to be put off when worn out or broken, as we put off a garment no longer useful; that we are then clothed in an organism so fine as not to be cognisable to our senses. St. Paul said that spiritual things are spiritually discerned. I believe many see, by spiritual sight, spirits who have left the body, and that some also hear them speak. These faculties, called clairvoyance and clair-audience, are natural faculties, capable of being developed and cultivated.

Are you alluding now to those who are called mediums?—Yes, and, as I understand, all are naturally mediums.

What, all of us?—Well, all who will take the trouble to discipline, in that direction, faculties which they have by nature. It is quite as possible to cultivate them as other faculties—memory, for instance. And as many as are our faculties, just so many, as I understand, are the modes of spirits manifesting their presence and action. Such is my belief. To me there is nothing supernatural in Spiritualism or mediumship.

Do you believe in materialisation?—I do: It is, as I understand the term, the putting on by a spirit of something material. Spirits are ordinarily unperceived by us; but their spiritual bodies can be clothed upon with material less fine than their own, and then we can see them and touch them. This materialising is a scientific operation to which all spirits are not competent.

Then do you believe that some spirits have greater power than others?—Yes, just as some of us, who are spirits in bodies, have greater knowledge than others.

Can you make this materialisation a little clearer?—Spirits tell us that spirit-chemists perform this operation on principles, as I understand, of attraction, polarization, and crystallisation; but they say that it is difficult for them to explain it to us, partly from the inadequacy of our language. I confess I do not comprehend how it is performed. At circles, where materialisation takes place, we understand that one spirit controls the others who are present, just as a stage manager controls performers and sends them on a stage; and he fixes the materialised spirit in such form that sometimes he can be recognised and talked with.

Have you recognised any?—Many, at various times in various circles; among them my father, my mother, my children, my stepmother, uncles, aunts, cousins, and friends.

What is the court to understand by dematerialisation?—The getting rid by the spirit of the material that has been put upon his spiritual body to render him visible to us.

Have mediums different powers?—Their powers vary just as those of musicians, doctors, lawyers, or jurors; and they differ from one another as to their faculties. I have had, through one of them, in Mrs. Miller's mediumship, answers to questions written on the inner sides of slates locked together.

Could you command answers obtained in that way?—No more than you could from me if I were not able and willing to give one. I have sometimes put questions and the answer has been "I do not wish to answer that"; sometimes, "I cannot answer"; sometimes, "The spirit is not here to answer."

Can you make the subject of materialisation clearer?—I understand from spirits that they mesmerise the medium into the state of trance in order to keep her completely passive and enable them to draw from her the elements for making an appearance and come in contact with material things. I do not know if I make my meaning clear.

Proceed. You have only the court to convince.

Counsel for prosecution interposed: Proceed in what direction?—I would say something of spirit-personation.

Counsel for prosecution: I cannot see what we have to do in this case with all these theories. I submit the objection to the Court.

Judge Noonan: Does the defence desire to pursue this examination further?

Counsel for defence: We do.

Judge Noonan: Then proceed.

It is now an admitted scientific fact that one man can mesmerise another, and put him into a condition in which he is so much under his mental control as to make him do anything he wills him to do. A spirit can do this with some mediums, and is then said to entrance them. When Mrs. Miller is thus entranced I regard her as the mesmerised subject of a spirit. In spirit-personation Mrs. Miller, the medium, is then reduced to a state of passivity and may be controlled according to the spirit-mesmeriser's will. Then, if a spirit friend is present and wishes to speak, he gets, as I understand, permission of the controlling spirit; and, having that, controls the medium and addresses you as that friend.

On such occasions does the medium resemble that friend?—No; but I have sometimes marked a change in the medium's voice, reminding me of the friend speaking through her.

Are there other indications leading you to believe that disembodied spirits are present?—I have been told by them of occurrences known only to them and myself; they have told me their names, and, in various ways, have enabled me to identify them.

Can you tell us anything else showing that it is not the medium herself who so speaks?—Through her, my father and my children have spoken; and so has Colonel W. H. Coffin, who was Land Commissioner of the Pacific Railroad; J. N. Litton, who was Assistant-Attorney of that road; and Colonel Slayback, whom I have also seen while he so spoke, both here in St. Louis and at a medium's in New York.

Did he say anything that the medium could not have known?—He told of affairs connected with the circumstance of his being shot, and about the trouble that led to that sad event, none of which could she possibly have known.

When these spirits spoke did you distinguish their voices?—Yes; when we have had the condition of darkness, which, in Mrs. Miller's mediumship, is required for voice manifestations. The spirits explain that in a closed, darkened room the air is still, while the smallest ray of light sets it in vibration, and is against the manifestation. I have for that reason, when I would hear the spirit voices, always accepted the condition of darkness.

Then they are subject to natural conditions?—Perfectly.

You do not regard their manifestations as supernatural?—No; and when a spirit has a materialised exterior it will endure the light for a short time; then its elements begin to be attracted back to the medium. In the midst of conversations with me, spirit friends have suddenly stopped, and gone back to the medium in the darkened cabinet, presently to return and resume the conversation: they have explained that they have had to renovate from the medium. To me that is a natural and a rational explanation. The absence of physical light at a séance is a condition, for certain manifestations, which commends itself to my mind, especially in this of the spirit voice, for then there is no withdrawing for renovation. I have made a study of such manifestations with Mrs. Miller. Among spirits with whom I have thus communicated have been my well-known former friends, J. T. Glover and Judge Krumm.

How many séances have you attended at Mrs. Miller's?—Perhaps fifty.

You consider her a genuine medium?—I do.

Could you give a summary of her powers?—I do not consider her possessed of what are commonly called powers: the powers she appears to have come from the other side. She has an organism which spirits can use for manifesting their presence and action. For this they require passivity on her side. I have seen her, when she has been in a perfectly passive state, raised in her chair to the ceiling, and on it names have been written through her hand.

You have seen that done?—Yes.

Anything besides?—I have seen so many manifestations, and in so many different circles, that I would not attempt to specify from recollection.

The counsel for prosecution declined to cross-examine.

Judge Noonan having assured himself upon several points in the evidence, the witness descended from the stand. He had been under examination two hours.

The Spiritual Offering remarks that, whatever suffering may befall Mr. and Mrs. Miller, the cause of Spiritualism must receive an impetus from the publication in the newspaper Press of the testimony of Judge Portis; and it will be still more extensively published if the case is carried, as it is proposed, into a superior court.

VICTOR HUGO.—This great poet, who, for sixty years, excited the admiration of France and the world, while touching the noblest chords of the human soul, has gone from among us at the ripe age of eighty-three. From the first day of his illness, in May, he spoke of the coming close of his career with the composure to be expected of one of his faith. His convictions had long assumed a religious character in him, and he seemed to live partly in the spirit world. It is for his grieving family to remember his words: "Those whom we mourn are not absent, only invisible." Victor Hugo was one of the first who, in 1853, when certain savants distinguished themselves by venturing a mechanical explanation of them, investigated the phenomena of table movements and telegraphing, at séances in Jersey, with his friends Madame de Girardin, Auguste Vacquerie, and others, the account of which is given in Vacquerie's Mémoires de l'Histoire. In his will Victor Hugo bequeaths 50,000fr. to the poor; desires to be borne to the grave in their hearse; and declines the services of any Church; he concludes by declaring his belief in God, and asks a prayer of all souls. The death of the great poet is a national loss to be expressed in becoming national obsequies, before the final interment of his remains according to his will.—Le Messager.

CONCERNING SOME PHANTOM SOUNDS.

Hence it is that the generality of people who have not reflected know no other than that all sense is in the organs of the body, and consequently that when those organs fall to decay by death nothing of sense survives; when yet man, that is, his spirit, then comes into his veriest sensitive life.—SWEDENBORG.

Madame Guyon records an event in her life which gathers light from phenomena known to us and merits attention. She is speaking of M. Fouquet, and writes as follows: "Two days before the Fête-Dieu the maid went to make inquiries for me. She found him in the same state. He told her that he should come and bid me farewell when he died, but that he would not cause me any alarm. . . . As I lay in bed at midnight of the eve of Fête-Dieu, there came a glimmer into my room, which caused some little gilt nails near my bed to glow, along with a crash as if all the window-panes in the house had fallen. The maid, who slept in an adjoining room, ascended into that of her companion, thinking that all the window-panes had fallen into the garden. Nothing of the sort, however, had occurred. I thought nothing of it at the time, and sent as usual, the first thing in the morning, to inquire after M. Fouquet. She found him dead, and ascertained that he had died at the same hour at which what I have mentioned took place." ("La Vie de Madame Jeanne Marie de la Mothe Guion," écrite par elle-même.)

It is observable here that notice was given of the manifestation; that more than one person perceived it, and that no apparition accompanied it. These are distinguishing features, and they recur in the persecution of Mlle. Clairon. That story, like the last, is too long to quote in extenso; but, for purposes of comparison, it may be conveniently skimmed, after which I propose to append some very brief remarks. It will be remembered that the young actress had first encouraged, and finally rejected, her suitor, on account of his misanthropical disposition. He lost health in consequence, and died in two years and a-half from the commencement of their intercourse.

On the evening of his death, her mother and several friends supped with Mlle. Clairon. "The supper was gay. I had just been singing to them and they applauding me, when, as eleven o'clock struck, a piercing cry was heard. Its heartrending tone, and the length of time it continued, struck every one with astonishment. I fainted and remained for a quarter of an hour totally unconscious. . . . Every succeeding night, always at the same hour, the same cry was repeated, sounding immediately beneath my window, and appearing to issue from the vacant air. . . . Seven or eight days afterwards, while chatting with my ordinary circle of friends, the stroke of eleven o'clock was followed by a musket-shot, as if fired at one of my windows. Every one of us heard the report, every one of us saw the flash; but the window had received no injury. . . . For three entire months, every evening at the same hour, the same musket-shot, directed against the same pane of glass, was heard to explode, was seen, and yet no one was ever able to discover whence it proceeded. This fact is attested by its official record on the registers of the police." To this succeeded the clapping of hands, and lastly melodious sounds. "It seemed as if a celestial voice warbled the prelude to some noble air which it was about to execute."

Thus far the hauntings. For two years and a-half they had dogged their victim, and then they finally ceased. Then it was that Mlle. Clairon learnt something which seemed to elucidate her sufferings. It seems the lover, having petitioned in vain, on the evening of his death, for a final interview, had died with these ominous words on his lips: "Barbarous creature! But she shall gain nothing by it. I will pursue her as long after my death as she has pursued me during my life." * Now the moral atmosphere of these stories is different. In one we hear a pure spirit's passing-bell, no more. In the other we see passionate resentment subsiding by degrees into calm. The ominous cry is followed by a harmless explosion, and a humorous, though malicious, buffet. To these succeed the measured sounds of applause, and the "meed of a melodious tear."

But with that I am less immediately concerned. The points I wish to make are as follows: (1) The previous announcement of the sounds makes it probable that the announcer and the author of the sounds were the same intelligence. (2) This announcement itself finds its solution in the verifiable phenomenon of prevision in magnetic sleep. I may instance the case of Pierre Cazot (given in Newman's "Fascinations"), and the more celebrated case of M. Cazotte (given both there and more fully in Gregory's "Animal Magnetism"). (3) Hence it is my contention that the class of facts known as prevision in magnetic sleep may be made to include cases where the predictor fulfils his own prediction after his own bodily dissolution. With these observations I take leave of the subject in the hope that more stories will be forthcoming. It is facts that are wanted. If we wish to lay a sure foundation, we must trust to the solid ground of well-digested and luminously arranged facts.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of this Society will be held on Friday, June the 26th, at the Rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, London, S.W. The chair will be taken at 8.30 p.m. The meeting, which will be partly of a conversational character, is open to members and associates, who are at liberty to invite friends. Papers to be read: 1. Edmund Gurney, Esq., and Frederic W. H. Myers, Esq., "Some Higher Aspects of Mesmerism," Part II. 2. R. Hodgson, Esq., "Final Report on Phenomena attested by Members of the Theosophical Society" (concluded). Note: Members and associates will be admitted on writing their names at the door. Persons who do not belong to the Society will be admitted on the production of an invitation-card, duly filled in with one or more names, and signed by a member or associate.—Edward T. Bennett, Secretary, 14, Dean's-yard, Westminster, S.W.

MR. EGLINTON'S VISIT TO ULVERSTON.—A most animated controversy has for some time been going on in the Ulverston and Barrow-in-Furness Press, concerning the respective merits of Mr. Eglinton's psychographic manifestations and Mr. Gowland's ridiculous attempts at what he calls exposure of them. The supporters of Mr. Eglinton have championed his cause in the most spirited and determined manner, and we think, judging from the correspondence which we have read throughout, with complete success. The Ulverston Mirror has been most grossly attacked for asserting that Mr. Gowland's performance was a farce, but its assailants have been mortified to find that the editor of the Fulcan, a Barrow paper, who is not a Spiritualist, unqualifiedly endorses the Mirror's description of the affair as being in accordance with the general opinion of the audience, before whom the "exposer" performed in Barrow. Mr. Gowland's silly exhibition has only resulted in the triumphant vindication of Mr. Eglinton.

FRANCE.—Large audiences were drawn to three lectures delivered, during the week, from 18th to 25th May, in the Salle des Capucines, Paris, the first on "What is Spiritism?" by M. Metzger; the second on "What is Birth?" by M. Poinclet; the last by M. de Fonvielle, who maintained his established character as a philosopher, and as a man of sound common-sense. He concluded his lecture by contrasting the criticisms of investigators, like M. Richet, with those of charlatans like Cumberland.—The Spiritists of Marseilles assembled on the 31st March and celebrated the anniversary of the entrance into spirit-life of their Master, Allan Kardec. The occurrence is the more imposing to Spiritists from the fact of the same day being also the anniversary of the commencement of the era of modern Spiritualism in America.—Le Spiritisme.

PLATE IV.—BUST OF JOHN KING.

There are still several other equally important facts I have witnessed in "John's" manifestations, but which, bearing in mind that one proof is as good as many, I do not think necessary to describe; besides, the same or analogous occurrences have already been fully recorded by other investigators, or are settled questions to all who have carefully studied the usual séance-room phenomena. In my short notes on "John King," I have only referred to the more interesting characteristics of a familiar séance-room "spirit," who is distinguished from other "performing spirits" by his quiet and sedate manners, by his moral superiority, and by the perfection of his various manifestations.

To deal with all the visitors from the unseen world I met, at times or regularly, with the same or other mediums, would in a certain sense, and with but slight differences, be a repetition of the same history I have given, for "John;" that is to say, as far as their existence as séance-room "spirits" is concerned. The far more intricate question as to what these beings were in earth-life, or who they were, or by what name or title they were known, I am unable to answer. Moreover, it is of no more importance to the student of these remarkable phenomena to be acquainted with the past history of a "spirit," than it would be to know whether the first person one meets in the street ever had the measles in his childhood. If I am allowed to make a guess I should say that the majority of séance-room and materialising "spirits" did, in earth-life, belong to a class of humanity which were certainly not famous for their high intellect or morality. I have also several reasons to suppose that in most cases their earthly existence terminated suddenly, violently, and at that period of life usually termed the culminative point of physical existence, and that none of us ever met or knew the same individuality in earth-life.

However, the primary and more important question is that of facts and the value of these facts. To the student of spiritualistic phenomena they prove this—that there is a future life for some, that hence there must be a future life for all.

Last paragraph, 2nd column, line 2, for "and is" read is.

In the light of modern Spiritualism, death is merely the cessation of bodily activities, the departure of the soul from the outer form. The body becomes so weakened by disease or age that it is no longer capable of responding to the spirit, and it withdraws its forces, rises out of the material. This is the new birth, the resurrection of the spiritual body. When it is completed, the outer form is dead, and weeping friends gather around, mourning the loss of one who looks in pity upon the grief it has no power to assuage.—Spiritual Offering.

VILIFICATION OF MEDIUMS.—The Spiritual Offering, in its issue of May 23rd, quotes the article under this heading, which appeared in "LIGHT" of April 18th, including the letter of M. Boyard, translated from the Revue Spirite, on which it was based, and which exposed the fallacies of the "Exposers" of Madame Bablin, the medium of Paris. The Spiritual Offering adds to our remarks, which are characterised as just, that "this process is not confined to unbelievers in spirits, but is carried on, most bitterly, by some of those who profess to be Spiritualists of the cleanest, most intelligent, most respectable class. This has been the case in our own country as well as in Europe."

IMPORTANT NOTICE TO THE READERS OF "LIGHT."

We purpose shortly devoting a column or so of "LIGHT" weekly, to short records of facts with a view to future tabulation. We shall, therefore, be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

Mesmerism.	Communion with the Departed.
Trance.	Materialised Spirit Forms.
Clairvoyance.	The Spirit Rap.
Thought-reading.	The Spirit Voice.
Apparitions.	Spirit Writing.
The Human "Double."	Automatic Writing.
Presence at a Distance.	Movement of Material Objects
Haunted Houses.	without Physical Contact.

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, stating briefly

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.

RUSSIA.—The daughter of a peasant farmer, at Mataska, Finland, has suddenly shown singular mediumistic faculties. She falls into a kind of fit; then, becoming calm, she addresses those about her in choice and fluent language, very logically, and without repetitions. What comes from her lips is marked by pure morality without any allusion to the dogmas or doctrines in which she has been brought up. People come and listen to what she says with wonder. Spiritism is unknown there even by name.—Le Spiritisme.

AUSTRALIA.—At the anniversary of the advent of modern Spiritualism, at Melbourne, there was an exhibition of spirit-drawings, paintings, photographs, and direct writings. One drawing, remarkable for artistic skill, had been made apparently without the pencil having been lifted from beginning to end; there were not a few of the medium Duguid's paintings, done in darkness, on cards previously marked; a photograph of a drawing, done in presence of the circle by a spirit's materialised hand; photographs of direct writings on slates, done almost instantaneously; direct drawings done on paper previously marked, one of them on paper while enclosed and sealed in an envelope; mediumistic messages written from the end backwards to the beginning, in a flowing hand.—Harbinger of Light.

NEW ZEALAND.—Our correspondent at Greytown, New Zealand, writes that a Mr. Ellis there is a psychometric, and is also a clairvoyant and clairaudient medium. Holding the hand of an invalid, he presses the back of it against his forehead. This brings him into rapport with him, and he then describes the state of his ailing organs and indicates remedies. The general testimony is that he is correct in the former and successful in the latter.—Mr. Gerald Massey was there delivering stirring lectures.—A psychological society has been formed at Auckland. Its sub-committees, on thought-reading, mind-transference, mesmerism, clairvoyance, psychical phenomena, hauntings, and physical transference of objects, are in action. Dr. York has been lecturing here with such success that he will repeat his course at Dunedin before leaving for Sydney, where arrangements are made for his lecturing.—Harbinger of Light.

UNITED STATES.—There are six centres in Philadelphia from which the knowledge of Spiritualism is diffused—the Spiritual Temple Association, the First and Second Associations of Spiritualists, the Leyston and the Baker Hall Societies, and the Liberal League; and in all there is free admission to lectures. At Chicago a journal is just established entitled Mind in Nature; it treats of medical, psychical, and magnetical science. It specially studies the relation between the spirit and the body, and generally discusses the facts of Spiritualism and magnetism.—At New York the American Spiritualist Alliance took the Bijou Opera House for the celebration of the advent of modern Spiritualism. The entrance was free, and the space in the theatre hardly sufficed for the assembly.—At Milwaukee the anniversary was superbly kept by the Wisconsin Spiritualist Alliance. The proceedings, which commenced on Saturday, were carried over to Sunday to enable all the orations to be delivered.—Le Spiritisme.

SATURDAY, JUNE 20TH, 1885.

EXOTERISM AND ESOTERISM.

For many years spiritualistic phenomena have been presented to an incredulous and Sadducean public in the most frank, open, and unreserved fashion. Mediums have been numerous, and have exhibited their marvellous and inexplicable psychical powers, with an openness and unreserve strongly indicative of a thorough belief in their own abnormal, or, if not abnormal, at all events exceptional powers.

The Exoterism of nearly half a century has, however, largely yielded to the Esoterism of the present day, and the tyrants of physical science, who have resorted to an antiquated and almost forgotten law, for the purpose of crushing psychic powers, have themselves solely to blame for the changed aspect of spiritual investigation.

Not many months ago access to psychical séances was easily obtained; all candid and respectful inquirers were welcome visitors. Now, however, since pseudo-scientific men have resorted to an almost obsolete law and deeply prejudiced judges as a means of crushing strange psychical facts, the unreserve has properly given place to a prudent reserve, and a rigid passport is required for the admission of a stranger to a séance, or circle, in which uncommon psychical phenomena are likely to take place.

Nor is this, we regret to say, the worst. Far more inexcusable is the attitude adopted by some investigators who profess to be not only willing but anxious to sift the evidence for the reality of spiritual phenomena, and who are not altogether without experience. We do not say it is so, but it really seems that, in the estimation of this class of inquirers, a Spiritualist is regarded as a rogue and trickster until he is proved to be a honest man. This applies not only to mediums but also to any avowed Spiritualist who may be present at any meeting for experimental research in occult subjects. A glaring instance of this frame of mind occurred only recently. A circle of friends, only two of whom were Spiritualists, the rest being unconvinced, yet earnest seekers for the truth underlying these strange and occult facts, was formed to investigate certain alleged phenomena. In the result, we believe we are justified in saying that the party were satisfied as to the genuine character of the phenomena then observed. Yet now some of their colleagues, who were not present—advocates of the "fishing rod," "broom-stick and pencil," and the "chimney sweep's tackle," modus operandi—suggest that the whole of the evidence is vitiated and rendered useless because of the presence at the séances of the two believers. Spiritualists will appreciate at its true value such an attitude, and will doubtless act in consonance with it. It may be unfortunate, but the nett result of a frame of mind like this is to close every door against such inquirers. The onus of doing so at any rate does not rest with Spiritualists, and it is well that the fact should be placed on record.

The profession of a psychic was always a precarious one. So far as remuneration was concerned, they realise greatly less of this world's wealth for their self-denying labours, than do ordinary persons with much less exceptional powers, such for example as preachers, lecturers, vocalists, conjurers, &c., and they run greatly more risk of psychical contamination from miscellaneous visitors, than do any caterers for public instruction or amusement.

In all ages coercion has been used to repress advanced facts, but it was hoped by sanguine souls that, at the close of the nineteenth century, repression of occult phenomena, by imprisonment or fine, would not have been appealed to, when every reasonable opportunity for exposure, if exposure were practicable, was open to all intelligent inquirers. Notwithstanding coercive repression by antiquated laws, the marvellous fact remains that all who have candidly entered upon the investigation with a view to the exposure of the supposed artifice, have, after due examination, become acknowledged believers. The only persons who affirm the imposition theory and who sometimes desire to carry their convictions into a court of law, whose tribunals are presided over by men, the opinions of whom, on their own showing, cannot be influenced by evidence, are hasty charlatans, who, after a few hours' observation, have leaped to the lame and impotent conclusion that they had detected fraud, when the alleged fraud was merely false inference, the result of preconception and inexperience, and which was fully disproven by the written testimonies of many competent and careful witnesses, men whose opinions as to matter of fact would, on any other subject, be accepted without hesitation.

It is sincerely to be hoped that some of our more liberal representatives in Parliament may speedily direct national attention to the imperative necessity that exists for the repeal of antiquated laws, the sole use of which can only be to aid dogmatic sceptics in their vain attempts to suppress the exhibition of genuine psychical phenomena, which run directly counter to the dogmatic materialism of the present age, and which assuredly prove to all candid and courageous minds that the limitation at present placed on natural laws must be relaxed, and the genuineness of phenomena acknowledged, that by the majority are now classed among the impossible.

LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

On Thursday evening next, June 25th, at 8 p.m., the Alliance will hold the last conversazione of the summer session. We hope there will be a large attendance of members and friends to welcome Mr. Shorter, and to congratulate the esteemed president, Mr. Stainton Moses (who will take the chair), on his return to public work after his long and severe illness. We are sure a very large number of his friends will be glad of the opportunity of once more seeing his face and hearing his voice at these meetings.

As regards Mr. Thomas Shorter, who during the evening will speak on "Modern Spiritualism: the Progressive Development of its Phenomena,"—he, surely, needs no introduction. His name will ever be associated with the pioneers and leaders of modern Spiritualism. Though held in high honour and esteem now, his services to the cause will be more highly appreciated as years go by, as the wealth of the facts he has stored in our public records comes to be known. If we may judge from past experience, we can safely promise our friends that Mr. Shorter, as usual, will have something to say worth telling, and that, equally a matter of course, he will say it well. Full details of the meeting will be found in our advertisement columns. Members can obtain tickets for the introduction of friends on application to the Hon. Sec., Mr. M. Theobald, 62, Granville-park, Lewisham, S.E.

We are asked to announce that members of the Council attend at the chambers of the Alliance, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, every Tuesday evening, from six to eight o'clock, to receive members and friends.

MR. CECIL HUSK'S SEANCES.

In response to many letters of inquiry which, during the last three months have reached us in respect to Mr. C. Husk's séances, we are glad to be in a position to publish the following accounts of a séance at which we were also present. We leave the other witnesses to speak for themselves, merely remarking that, so far as the séance goes, we were ourselves thoroughly satisfied. While disapproving very strongly of the methods sometimes recently adopted at Mr. Husk's séances, we have always regarded him as a powerful medium. The unwise methods of which we speak have, we are assured, obtained chiefly through force of circumstances, and the medium's sad physical affliction. Mr. Husk is almost blind, and this has necessitated, in a large measure, dependence upon others. He has, in consequence, unfortunately allowed himself to be placed in positions which have, in some cases, caused feelings of distrust. We do not think there is any valid foundation for this, and Mr. Husk, now that the subject has been mooted to him, is very anxious to remove any cause for dissatisfaction, and we can ourselves testify that he has always been willing to allow investigators to satisfy themselves, in every reasonable way, as to the abnormal character of the phenomena occurring in his presence. We should advise those who intend to avail themselves of his services—and we hope our readers will not be slow to do so—to stipulate that he should sit for them by himself, and not in partnership with another medium; also to confer with his guides as to the conditions to be observed, his instructors having always shown themselves desirous of meeting the inquirer.

I gladly contribute my evidence of what took place at the séance held on Monday, June 8th, at No. 6, Nottingham-place, by sending you this short account of what I observed on that occasion.

The room in which we sat was a small one, having no cupboards or other places in which any one could be concealed. So small, indeed, was it that during the sitting it was not possible for any one to move about or pass round the "circle" between the backs of the chairs and the small tables which stood against three of the walls. There were ten sitters besides the "medium," Mr. Husk, and we were directed to join hands and put out the gas. In a few minutes the "spirits," having made their presence known by "raps," were asked if we were sitting right. We were not; but we soon re-arranged ourselves to their satisfaction, and then sat in the following order: Mr. Husk on the north side with his back to the fire-place; on his left Mr. Farmer, then Mrs. Farmer, Mr. Williamson, Mr. Templeton, Colonel Lean, Mrs. M., Mr. C., Mr. Eglinton, myself (Major Taylor), and lastly, on Mr. Husk's right, Mr. Bentall. It was my experience while changing from one side of the table to the other, in the dark, that enables me to make the statement about there not being much room to move.

Very shortly Mr. Husk's "guides," "John King" and "Irresistible" became audible, and were asked if they had any objection to Mr. Husk's hands being fastened. They had none, so the gas was lighted, and Mr. Bentall produced some copper wire and a piece of tough wood about two feet long, an inch wide, and half as thick, having eight small holes in it, in pairs, a pair at one inch and a-half from each end of the stick, and two pairs three inches inside these. He proceeded to fasten Mr. Farmer's right hand by passing the ends of a bit of the copper wire through the two holes nearest one end of the stick, placing his hand through the loop thus formed, and tightening down the wrist to the stick by twisting the wire underneath. He secured each of Mr. Husk's hands in the same way to the stick at the two pairs of inner holes, and then I bound his left at the remaining pair of holes, so that now four hands were attached to the stick in such a way that Mr. Husk's could be held each by a neighbour on either side. As soon as we were in darkness again, the zither, or whatever the name of the musical instrument is which lay on the table, was touched, notes were sounded, and the zither was taken up and moved round the "circle" above our heads. I heard it strike some of the sitters on the head, and it struck me in a similar way. I was able to follow its movements owing to its having a round spot of luminous paint on it which I kept in view. The light I followed was on the instrument, for I was able to thrust out my head, and touch the luminous spot with my cheek once as it paused in the air close to me. It also moved about the room quite out of reach of any sitter. This I am sure of, not so much by the sound it emitted, but because I repeatedly saw it cross and recross a line of light which shone into the room, from the passage, between the door and the post from which it was hung. It was not held by any visible hand, but appeared to float by itself. All this while the various "spirits" were speaking, and were now asked if they would permit another test to be applied. They readily consented. The test was that Mr. Husk should take into his mouth, and keep there for a short time, half a wine-glassful of claret and water. Light being obtained Mr. Husk had the wine and water administered to him. On the room being again darkened "John King" spoke, and to my ear more clearly and distinctly than before; but unmistakably in the same voice as usual. Once during the séance I distinctly heard two "spirits" speaking at the same moment, at what appeared to be opposite sides of the table, but I don't remember if it was at that time or afterwards. As Mr. Husk could only keep the wine and water in his mouth for a short time, the gas was soon lit again, and very nearly the same quantity of wine and water was returned by him to the wine-glass as he had taken from it. This was seen by comparing it with a second wine-glass filled at first equally with the other.

After this I was patted on the head by a soft, small hand, which was warm and felt quite human-like. It touched me very lightly, and passing down my face, pulled out the ends of my moustache on both sides, and then, going under my chin, it seemed to feel its way down my necktie, and unbuttoned the top button of my coat. While it was doing this I bent my head and kissed it. It did not flinch or give way on receiving this salute, and felt to my lips quite firm though very soft and velvety. At another time I was seized by both ears, my left being pulled till I remonstrated. "Irresistible" acknowledged to this, but said that the former hand was, he supposed, that of some friend or connection of mine, but he did not know whom.

Colonel Lean said he would produce a postage stamp if the "spirits" would place it on his face. On consenting he got it out and at once it was placed on his forehead as we all saw, a match being struck for the purpose. Mr. Farmer then asked that it might be transferred to his face. This was done, the stamp appearing on Mr. Farmer's face when next light was produced. One other thing was done to me worth mentioning. I asked to be touched on the end of the nose, and, though I took care to move my head each time after I spoke, in less than half a minute I was touched a quarter of an inch from the spot indicated, the error being at once corrected. Many more things happened which I cannot now give in the order of occurrence, but at last light was asked for and the séance terminated.

I do not know how all these manifestations came about, but of this I am quite certain that Mr. Husk was in no way the physical cause of any of them. I cut the wires after the séance to release him and his neighbours. The wire had made but one mark on their wrists and that a deep one. So tightly were they fastened that I had to use some force to get one jaw of the nippers between the wires and the flesh.—I remain, yours faithfully,

G. L. L. M. TAYLOR, Major,
Bedfordshire Regiment.

R.M.C.

On Monday, June 8th, 1885, I was present at a test-sitting with Mr. Husk as medium, at the house of Mr. W. Eglinton. The circle comprised eleven persons, of whom two were ladies. Shortly after the lights were extinguished slight taps were heard. They proceeded apparently from the "fair bells" which had been placed on the table. The positions of the sitters were changed more than once, the directions being given by the raps. When the circle was finally arranged, Mr. Farmer sat on the medium's left, and Mr. Bentall on his right. A piece of wood with holes bored in it was then produced; and to this Mr. Husk's wrists were bound with copper wire, one wrist of each of his neighbours being similarly secured. It was then impossible for the medium to move his hands without the knowledge of his neighbours; and the copper wire was fastened so tightly round the wrists that it appeared impossible that any of the hands could be withdrawn. This test had been adopted with the consent of Mr. Husk's "spirit-guides," whose voices had been already heard. Mr. Husk and his neighbours remained bound in the manner described until the end of the sitting. Notwithstanding this, the "fairy bells" rose from the table and floated, playing faintly, some feet over the sitters' heads; all the sitters were touched on the hands and some on the heads; a postage stamp was taken from Colonel Lean's hand, and was affixed to his forehead, and was then removed and fixed on Mr. Farmer's face. These phenomena occurred in total darkness, a light being struck from time to time to observe the results. It was then proposed to apply a test to the "spirit voices." Accordingly half a sherry-glass of claret and water was poured into Mr. Husk's mouth. Almost immediately after the light was extinguished, the voice of "John King" was heard. He spoke but a very few words. They were, as far as my recollection goes: "Will this do? God bless you all." The voice was full and sonorous, and resembled exactly the well-known voice of "John King." No other voice was heard, although the spirit "Irresistible" was requested to speak. A light was obtained, and Mr. Husk spat out the liquid. He had swallowed a very small quantity; and I do not think it possible for him to have produced the voice we heard. During the course of the sitting four distinct "spirit voices" were heard; but "John King" was the only one who spoke while Mr. Husk had the claret and water in his mouth. No materialisation of any sort took place.

C. N. WILLIAMSON.

I have been asked to make a short report of a séance held with Mr. Husk under certain test conditions, and now do so.

We sat down eleven round the table, and after some shifting found ourselves properly arranged. By raps permission was given to apply the main test, that of a stick and wires, which served the purpose of binding the medium's hands, as it were, "in the stocks." The gentlemen on either side had also their nearest hand bound down with the medium's, thus preventing all possibility of Mr. Husk in any way employing his hands or arms. While so fastened, "Irresistible," "Ebenezer," "Tom Cole," and "John King," spoke from various points of the table, and everyone seemed to very accurately recognise the different tones and mannerisms of the voices. Everyone also was more or less touched by hands, and a musical instrument floated. Mr. Husk then took half a wine-glassful of claret and water in his mouth, and while thus deprived of the power of clear utterance, "John King's" voice very distinctly and recognisably said, "God bless you, light up." (As to two last words.) The claret and water was returned almost in exact quantity to the wine-glass.

I sat by Colonel Lean, and he suddenly proposed that a stamp should be taken from his hand and placed on the roof. I held his hand firmly in which lay the stamp, felt the touch of delicate warm fingers shortly on both our hands; and immediately afterwards came an exclamation from Colonel Lean, who declared that it (the stamp) had been placed on his brow, a voice remarking, that was surely "his roof." The stamp was afterwards placed at request on Mr. Farmer's face at the opposite side of the circle. In other ways the séance was indeed very satisfactory, and, to Spiritualists, Mr. Husk's genuine mediumistic power was indubitably proved. For outside sceptics, however, who give no trust to Spiritualists themselves, the presence of a second medium somewhat weakens the test conditions.

BERYL STONE.

At the invitation of Mr. Eglinton I attended the séance held at his house last Monday for the purpose of testing the psychical powers of Mr. Husk. It was held in Mr. Eglinton's own room. On the table were placed the "fairy bells" and an improvised trumpet. The light being put out, the circle was arranged by means of raps. I was placed at the right hand of the medium, Mr. Farmer being at his left. The light was then turned up, and by way of test I was permitted to secure the medium's hands with copper wire to a strong oak-spline. I also fastened Mr. Farmer's right hand to the same spline, and my own left hand was similarly treated. During the séance I also held the medium's right hand. The light being put out I soon heard a deep voice purporting to be that of "John King," saying, "God bless you all." During the sitting I heard this voice repeatedly, as well as others, which were recognised as belonging to "Irresistible," "Ebenezer," and I believe, "Tom Cole." In the course of the séance the medium was tested to ascertain whether these voices were produced independently of his vocal organs. A light was struck, and the medium took into his mouth nearly a wine-glassful of red liquid. On the light being put out, "John King's" voice was heard almost immediately, as deep and full as ever. A light was again procured, and the medium emptied the liquid from his mouth back into the glass, there being nearly the same quantity as he had originally taken. At an early period in the séance the "fairy bells," which had a small disc of luminous paint attached to its under surface, rose, playing, into the air. The disc could be distinctly seen as it flew about in all directions. I was repeatedly touched on the head, face, and arm by both the "fairy bells" and trumpet. My knees were also touched by what seemed to be fingers. The voices seemed to speak through the trumpet, and to travel from one part of the room to the other.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Spectator gives a page to the discussion of the mind-reading theory of Psychological Researchers, as an explanation of the phenomena of Spiritualism, and the writer comes to the very sensible conclusion that it does not explain materialisation, nor psychography, nor any of the physical manifestations. Thought-reading has nothing to do with the movements of material objects. Thought-reading does not thumb guitars, nor play pianos, nor thread chairs on your arm, nor write and draw in closed boxes, or in total darkness.

No; thought-reading simply stands by itself, and may be an individual spiritual or mental faculty, but it gives no explanation whatever of what are called spiritual manifestations. And why try to explain simple evident facts? If I throw up a stone it comes down again. This is an astounding fact that no one has ever succeeded in explaining—not even by thought-reading. We talk of a force which brings down the stone, and call it gravitation—but a name, even of six syllables, explains nothing. We do not know what a force is, nor how it acts. We simply see what is done—as with the phenomena of Spiritualism.

The spirits themselves cannot explain the things they do. Two slates lie one upon the other in full light. Between them is a sheet of paper and the new clean nib of a steel pen. On the top slate is a heavy inkstand. In a few moments I lift off the inkstand and the upper slate, and find the paper closely written over in ink on both sides, in two entirely different handwritings, which I recognise as those of persons who have departed this life, and the steel pen is full of ink. Now what relation has thought-reading to such a fact as that?

One of the writers did try to explain. He wrote: "Thus you see that we have the power to take the component particles of the ink between the slates, put them together again, and use them contrary to the 'well-known laws of nature.'" But how they did it, he did not attempt to explain. At all events, it was not thought-reading. Nor do I see how another dimension of space helps the matter. And as I can find no explanation of the modus operandi of the common phenomena of our daily life, I utterly despair of ever knowing, in this world, the how or the why of anything.

Therefore I rest upon the facts, and what may be fairly inferred from them. If we lack absolute proof of the individual identity of spirits we have a satisfactory moral conviction. We know that spirits live, talk, write, and give us the best evidences they can of their identity. They prove beyond all doubt the reality of spirit life. They demonstrate Spiritualism.

No physical science rests upon a more secure foundation. No facts are better established. The efforts to explain them show that they cannot be denied. And the so-called religious periodicals admit the facts when they attribute them to the power and malice of fallen angels. "No doubt these things are done," they say. "The facts are undeniable. They accord with prophecy—they prove the truth of revelation. But they are the work of evil spirits."

So be it. If evil spirits can give us sensible proofs of their existence, why not good ones? If Satan can appear to us, why not Smith or Jones? Are we to neglect, reject, or denounce Spiritualism because there are bad spirits? We might reject or denounce the universe by that rule. If God tolerates Satan why should we bother about him? When the angels of God came into the presence of their Creator, "Satan came also among them," and got permission to torment Job.

Cannot our religious editors see that even diabolic Spiritualism existed very long ago by the Divine permission? If God allowed Satan to talk with Him, and even accepted a challenge to a contest with him, as later on in Egypt, why denounce Spiritualism because it is Satanic or diabolic? Of course it is. Every bad spirit, angelic or human, enters into the constitution of Spiritualism.

The poem esteemed the grandest in our language—Milton's "Paradise Lost"—is utterly spiritualistic. Its characters are God, Satan, Adam, Eve, hosts of good angels and hosts of bad ones. Have the writers of our religious newspapers ever read Milton? They call Spiritualism diabolic. It is such as God has made it, or permitted it to come. We are not responsible for fallen angels or fallen men.

What our preachers, from the Pope and Archbishop of Canterbury all the way down—and the religious Press of all grades—should do, is to see what Spiritualism, good or bad, can do to help them in their contest with Materialism. We offer them a body of carefully examined and scientifically tested facts which prove that the spirit of man survives the death of his body.

The most important thing for religion in the broadest sense of the word, is to have absolute proofs of immortality—which Spiritualism alone can give.

"Last season," says Society, "witnessed a sudden and remarkable revival of 'Spiritualism,' as it is called; and fashionable society, ever eagerly searching after some new thing, took the matter up with characteristic vigour. As far as may be judged, the 'straws which show the direction of the wind' would appear to herald an even increased demand for psychological phenomena during the present season."

For one reason, "anything new is certain to attract the blasé members of the 'best set,' and Spiritualism was 'taken up by the best people.' It was only necessary to hint that Royalty regarded Spiritualism and its professors with a favourable eye; then there was for the young the attraction of sitting in darkened rooms with clasped hands, while to their elders there was all the fascination of doing something wicked—a game of bo-peep with the devil." So on for nearly a page, ending with the curious assertion that "the world of Spiritualism, supported by some very illustrious people, is at direct issue with the best known members of the scientific world."

The fact is in exact opposition to this assertion. Every scientific man in Europe or America who has given the facts of Spiritualism careful examination is a Spiritualist. Whatever theories he may have as to origin, mode, or object, the facts are beyond question. Intelligent forces, claiming to be human spirits, are seen, heard, felt, and do many things generally regarded as impossible, and by a portion of the religious world as diabolical.

Mrs. Richmond is lecturing in the Town Hall at Kensington, Mrs. Hardinge Britten has just returned, and Mr. Colville is on his way, from America, which is too warm from June to September for lectures, except at camp meetings. So our birds of passage come over, and return in the autumn, while some find it pleasant and profitable to make lecturing tours quite around the world. "Many shall run to and fro and knowledge shall increase."

Mrs. JENCKEN has returned to America. It is not expected that she will again visit England.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

This Society held the seventh meeting of its present session on the 10th inst., when a paper, of which the following is an abstract, was read by the Hon. Rodon Noel, on the value of the historical element in Christianity.

Although the essence of the Christian system, as well as of any other religious system, is inward, spiritual, and universal, rather than outward, historical, and particular, the historical element has a distinct value as constituting a vehicle for the spiritual; and that there was a real historical basis seemed to be sufficiently proved by the testimony of contemporary classical writers to the fact that Jesus was regarded by His followers as a Divine person. Not even Strauss denies the genuineness of four of St. Paul's Epistles, which go back to A.D. 60, and suffice to show that the history of the Gospels was then already believed by the Church, which it hardly could have been had the narratives been myths. And the readiness of the first Christians to suffer martyrdom for their faith proved the genuineness of their convictions. The famous work, "Historic Doubts concerning the Existence of Napoleon," showing that his history was but a new form of the solar myth, proves how easily actual history can be plausibly discredited. And the argument of Christian divines—that the foundation and establishment of the Christian Church within so short a period are hardly intelligible without an actual resurrection of its Founder—seemed unanswerable, though the precise nature of this resurrection had been left for us to gather from the phenomena of modern Spiritualism.

His object, however, was not so much to prove the historical basis of Christianity as to exhibit the value of an historic Christ. It is true that the Gospel narrative may, and ought to be, regarded as an allegory of the regeneration and development of the human soul, a parable of interior processes common to all the elect. But what are termed real events are often as good a parable as imaginary ones, and have, besides, a special value in being real. Nature herself, in mountain, sea, lake and plain, is one vast parable or allegory, as much as is Dante's "Divine Comedy," Spenser's "Faery Queen," or Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress." Yet the external world is a concrete fact. And moreover, when we speak of the human soul, its regeneration and education, we must remember that the term is an abstraction and there are really only human souls. So that if we allege the Gospel history to be an allegory of the regeneration of the soul, what we mean is the regeneration of every individual soul, past, present, and future. So that if the history related in the Gospels represents the actual experiences of some particular soul, it would be even more valuable than if it were simply a mythical or imaginary history. If—as is the case—external events are important only as they serve to develop and manifest character generally, they become the more important in the case of a particular Divine-human individual, as was Jesus. As for the question of the possibility or impossibility of these events, it is not for students of, and believers in, occult phenomena to question them on this ground. That would be the part of the Agnostic and Materialist. We, on the contrary, have seen reason to conclude that what are called miracles are neither impossible nor improbable. Nor is the alleged previous occurrence of some of the incidents an argument against their genuineness, if we consider that all material phenomena and external events are but the ultimations, on the lower plane, of spiritual realities, and liable to recur under corresponding conditions. Human lives and conduct are as much subject to laws as the physical phenomena of the earth and sky. There is even a correspondence between the two classes of phenomena. The festivals, rites, and ceremonies of the Christian Church have been shown to resemble those of the ancient pagan nature-worship, and to represent but new adaptations of the solar myth, as illustrated in the histories of Baal, Osiris, Mithras, and Apollo. But this only confirms the poetic view of the essential identity of the spiritual and material worlds, by showing that the latter is but a reflection, manifestation, or "incarnation" of the former. Hence, so far from doubting the reality of a career on the ground that it represented such a correspondence, rather should we expect that in the case of a special manifestation of the Divine-human consciousness, there would be such a providentially-ordered career as would specially exemplify such correspondence, and constitute at the same time a representative career of all perfected souls. Nor would the human imagination be competent for the elaboration of such a conception unaided by the view of an actual career. The ideal embodied in Jesus Christ was not that of Rome, Judea, or Greece, or Alexandria, nor that of the Stoics, the Essenes, or the Ascetics. No doubt, there are features in common with those of Buddha and other great spiritual teachers. But certainly it was not in the power of the fishermen of Galilee to have created such a noble concrete presentment at once of character, doctrine, and life, and one so much in advance of what the world has even now been able to appropriate and realise in its institutions and customs, or to pay much more than a verbal homage to. As well try to believe in a Buddhism without Buddha, in a Mahometanism without Mahomet, as in a Christianity without Christ. Heroic personalities, of moral and intellectual genius, may be partly the resultant of pre-existing and surrounding influences; but they bring something of their own with them from God, which has the true magical, supernatural, transforming power to compel, mould, and burn—as it were—the clay into forms of use and beauty.

Moreover, though regeneration must be wrought within each soul for itself, and cannot be effected by proxy, the question remains, How is this brought about? Surely not alone by mere introversion—seeing that we are not isolated units but members of one another—but by the aid of other and advanced souls, who serve to show us the way. Actual lives, such as those of a Washington, a Mazzini, a Gordon, are worth many sermons, or even processes of abstract reasoning. Besides, the proud resolve to look only within ourselves for strength is an attitude unbefitting a mortal, who possesses of necessity sources of weakness within himself. There is something to be said for the Christian virtue of humility and dependence upon a Divine power rather than in our own, as against the arrogant self-confidence of a philosophy merely intellectual. We are not ourselves without our fellows, without Nature; but are only truly ourselves in these. At all events, such affectation of self-reliance could become only the very flower and crown of humanity. Yet even Jesus was filial in His attitude, and looked ever to the All-Father. We cannot all of us form in our imaginations a beautiful ideal after which to aspire; so that it is of infinite importance to us that a noble example be real, and to know not only that some have come near to its attainment, but that it has actually been realised. Herein lies the immense value of belief in Jesus Christ as an historical person—a man who on earth felt and consummated His essential identity with God: not in the orthodox sense, but only as one who fully developed and realised the Divine-human nature which belongs to the race, and of which all have the potentiality here or hereafter. Not that any belief in such historical reality is essential to salvation. Many a person is far more obviously "saved" who has no such belief than many who hold it with rigid insistence. Such a belief is, nevertheless, greatly conducive to a saving faith by the encouragement and support it affords; though salvation by faith in Christ is undoubtedly salvation by faith in the Divine man within. But there is a sense in which the life and death of Jesus are indeed vicarious as an atonement, propitiation, and reconciliation for the race. The true being of each is in all, since we are solidary to each other; and hence it is impossible that any evil or good can be wrought in the world without the race being effected by it beneficially or the reverse; but they are a secret leaven for life or death. That a mere phenomenal or temporal event can have such momentous consequences, is because we are under those conditions, although we and the influencing event are also rooted in the eternal. Other nations and epochs have, in their kind and degree, their Saviours also, who are Christs to them. There may have been a human Osiris, and a human Balder, as well as a human Sakya Muni and Zoroaster. The point is that the Christ within needs to be awakened by the Christ without.

The paper, the argument of which only we are able to report, was replete with poetic imagery and diction, as well as with metaphysical thought. In the discussion which followed, and which represented considerable diversity of view, the President cited a number of important discrepancies between the Gospels, and also between these and the other books of the New Testament, of a nature to show that their writers did not pretend to historical precision; and also certain changes in the Revised Version, seriously affecting current orthodox conceptions. The discussion was eventually adjourned to the next meeting, to be re-opened with a paper by Mr. Maitland on the intention and method of the Gospels.

SOME years ago there was a mesmeric infirmary in London, where surgical patients were put into the mesmeric sleep and then operated upon painlessly. Just as this was giving an impetus to the study of mesmerism, chloroform was introduced, which, being more speedy in its action, was, as an anesthetic, made to supersede the mesmeric sleep.—H. R. HAWES.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.—The discourse announced last week, was delivered on Sunday evening last at Kensington Town Hall, to a full and attentive audience. Before it was given, a short time was devoted to answering questions, put on the subjects of Faith-Cure and Astrology. The address was powerful and impressive, and we cannot hope to give other than a faint impression. It commenced by stating that there could be no mysticism in truth. The Divine had, in all ages, revealed truth to men commensurate to their need, and as often as the revelation became incrustated in error, the message had been repeated, and the truth revealed in its pristine purity. Christianity was the latest revelation, but it was not therefore the only true religion. Other beliefs were not necessarily idolatrous. Each had its central truth. Truth became obscured, as forms and symbols were used to portray it, and in time the inner meaning became lost, and the forms themselves alone were worshipped, and thus true worship was changed to idolatry. In ancient times the sun was made the emblem of Deity. No earthly symbol could be more appropriate. The devotees of this ancient cult did not worship the physical sun, but saw in it the symbol of the beneficent Creator. In India, men typified the Creator under the threefold form of Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, to denote his eternity: "The great I was, I am, and am to be." In Egypt He was also in the threefold form of Osiris, Isis, and Horus. In the Mosaic dispensation His name was Jehovah, denoting the same Trinity. In the Christian religion the same threefold symbol is still typified. Revelation became buried in allegory. Idols and temples were reared. Symbols were worshipped instead of the truths themselves. The Jews were repeatedly warned by their prophets of this idolatry—the worship of the form instead of the Spirit. Even Christians have become in like manner enslaved and overlook the inner meaning of their faith. He who worships the form, and not the Living Word, commits idolatry whether he be Christian, or a follower of some other belief. Religious truth is not to be found by searching out the ancient forms of revelation. They are dead, and have fulfilled their purpose. The world can no longer understand them, or perceive their interior meaning. We cannot put new wine into old bottles, neither can we eat the manna given to the children of Israel. To-day there is dawning a new religion—a living word suitable to the needs of the present hour. The same truths, the same precepts of benevolence, the same unselfishness are set forth, but presented in new views adapted to new conditions. We are to be ourselves the temples of the Living Word. The Kingdom of God is within each of us.—After the address an impromptu poem was given on the subject chosen by the audience, namely, "Christ: His mission on earth." It was announced that the services would be continued for four more Sundays, and that the subject for next Sunday would be "What is the New Religion?" The present series of discourses will terminate on Sunday, July 12th inclusive. The next series will commence on Sunday, September 20th. Due notice will be given.

CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM ASSOCIATION OF INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM.—On Thursday evening Mr. Robson kindly attended at 81, Wells-street, Chamberwell, and gave several interesting and satisfactory tests. On Sunday afternoon an open-air meeting was held on Peckham Rye, when an address was delivered by Mr. Enns, of Hackney, which attracted the attention of many to whom the subject was new. It is intended to continue the open-air meetings during the summer months, and friends are earnestly requested to support the movement.—A.

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS (43, Manor-place, Walworth-road).—On Sunday evening last, Miss Keeves visited us, and her spiritual instructors delivered through her an address on the text "Blessed are the pure in heart." After the address several questions were asked which elicited satisfactory replies. To the question of a lady, the instructors of Miss Keeves gave, as an answer, a clairvoyant description of three spirit friends who were standing beside her, which was acknowledged by the lady in question as being correct. On Sunday next, Mr. Swatbridge will speak. After Sunday next we contemplate closing the meeting-place till the first Sunday in August, as during July several of our members will be absent from London.—COK.

WHEN the body of our beloved is laid where the birds sing in the green branches above it and flowers perfume the air, as nature's silent forces disintegrate the lovely form, the soul is not there! Where is it? In our Father's house are many mansions: controlled by its highest attraction the emancipated spirit passes to spiritual spheres, where life assumes a grander aspect and broader significance than it could in the limited sphere of earth. If the spirit has the strongest attractions to earth it lingers lovingly in the home, sympathising in the grief of those it still loves with all the intensity of human affection, trying to give signs and tokens of its presence, and to transmit to desolate hearts a portion of the light and joy surrounding it. In order to satisfactorily accomplish this first desire of the spirit it must be brought into conscious communion with friends, who too often think of it as beyond the reach of human sympathy, cut off from all intercourse by an impassable gulf.—Spiritual Offering.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerov, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE report: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say, I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROSWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, Monsieur, &c.,

"(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiassed opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but

I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form, nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianimic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation, and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.—(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI, Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

THE ETYMOLOGY OF THE WORD "OD" AND THE RELATIONS OF THE ODYLIC FORCE WITH ANIMATE AND INANIMATE OBJECTS.

BY

SAMUEL EADON, M.D., M.A. (EDIN.), PH.D.

As there is always a reason, cause, or purpose for the imposition of a name to a thing, and which is always appropriate at the time when first applied, though often the "why" or the "wherefore" of its being so used is lost sight of, or forgotten, or incapable of being traced out, owing to attrition, contraction, and other lingual changes, so there is a reason why the little word "OD" was at first made use of to express the conditions, qualities, and relations of this new cosmic force, which Baron Reichenbach found to pervade every object in the wide universe of God, from the stellar orbs above, to the rolling ocean around, and the vast underlying strata beneath.

Heat, light, electricity, and magnetism, the four acknowledged forces of the scientists, have been insulated, weighed, and measured; but no genius has yet devised an odoscope, or invented an odometer whereby to scan or to measure this marvellously attenuated and wondrously refined form of matter—being of all the imponderabilia, the most subtle and delicate.

The existence of this force, and its completed demonstration as a distinct dynamic power, was first shown by Baron Charles von Reichenbach in his work entitled "Physico-Physiological Researches on the Dynamics of Magnetism, Electricity, Heat, Light, Crystallisation and Chemism;"—a work, in advance of the scientific notions of the age, but one that can afford to lie in abeyance till the mind of science comes up to it, so as to appreciate and apply this force to the ordinary concerns of life, whether domestic, therapeutic, philosophic, or what not.

Its want of confinability renders the invention of an instrument of measurement a matter of great difficulty. As a force standing midway between magnetism, electricity, and caloric, it required a peculiar word to express its properties and relationships. Now VA in Sanscrit, means to blow (motion); VADO in Latin means to go (motion); VADA in old Norse means to flow (motion); and, in old German, VADA by changing V into W and A into O, the word becomes Woda, which in that language signifies motion pervading all things, and which having blown on (motion), or gone forth (motion), or flowed away (motion) into infinite space, affected, in its varied transits, all kinds of matter till it came to be considered the grand all-pervading force of the Universe. In some German dialects WODA was written WODAN, or WODIN; leaving out the W, we get OD (IN), which the Germans personified as the great all-pervading power or deity. By striking out (IN) we obtain OD, which, consequently, means a force that, with unseen, but irresistible powers, rushes through, flows on, and pervades universal nature. Such is the etymology and meaning of that little word "OD," with its consequent derivatives of "Odic," "Odylic," "Odified," "Odoscope" and "Odometer."

Since the Odylic force is exceedingly delicate, and infinitesimally refined in its nature, and man has not been endowed with a special organ, or sense, in the present environment of things, for its perception, how, it may be asked, have we become acquainted with a force so evanescent and unconfined? Fortunately, mankind are born with different susceptibilities to surrounding objects and dynamic forces. The smell of certain flowers will cause fainting in some parties, whilst others are proof against emanations of all kinds, whether strong or weak. Females are more susceptible to all forms of refined and invisible influences than males. Hence the reason why Reichenbach called to his aid the delicate organisation of woman in his physical researches and experiments, carried on for hours in the profoundest darkness. The credibility of these provers cannot rationally, or consistently be called in question, unless human testimony is to be laid aside altogether.

Man, as stated before, having no special sense for the perception of the OD force, the experiments of Reichenbach, of necessity conducted in the dark, are intended to supply this natural defect; and it is to the Baron's indomitable perseverance, and to his elegantly and severely accurate experiments, that the world is indebted for all that is known relative to the principles, peculiarities, and relationships of the odylic force. The evidence is overwhelming. From 161 natural sensitives, selected from all classes of society, from the noble to the peasant, in darkness for hours at a time, with tests and counter-tests of every conceivable kind, were these experiments carried on. The following are just a few of the results selected from a vast array of curious phenomena recorded to have been seen by these highly gifted sensitives during their experimentation in the dark séances:—

The human body, as seen by these sensitives, seems bathed in a sort of translucent light. The body, being dual in formation, the right half seems of an azure blue colour, and, from the right fingers and toes, issue streams of blue light; the left half, seems bathed in a sort of pale orange-red colour, having sheaves of this radiant colour emanating from the left fingers and toes.

In the dark, a wife, of a highly sensitive nature, sees her husband and their child translucently asleep, as if bathed in cerulean blue and orange-red, and from their mouths, during the act of breathing, issue clouds of luminous vapour. The head itself is encircled with streams of radiant colour, such as are represented in Eastern paintings of Christ. Indeed, to highly-wrought sensitives, all human beings seem surrounded with a luminous atmosphere from head to foot. These, and many other appearances are seen by sensitives and demi-sensitives, more or less, and would be seen in broad daylight, and by everybody, had man been endowed with a special additional sense, for the perception of OD. This is the reason why this force has not been perceived earlier, and the laws determined and made known. Heat and light, electricity and magnetism, are closely allied; but whether there is a common origin, and these are merely distinct groups of phenomena, science has not yet determined. Certain it is, that the odic force, although often blending with, and forming a part of, the above-named forces, yet it is different from all of them, and from each of them, in particular.

OD cannot be heat, as the latter can be measured while the former cannot, and its mode of transmission is much slower.

OD cannot be light, for this body moves at the rate of 200,000 miles in a second of time, whilst that moves along a wire only as quickly as a man taking a brisk walk.

OD cannot be magnetism, for that force is only inherent in a few substances, and can only be conveyed along certain kinds of bodies, whereas OD can impinge and permeate every form of matter.

OD cannot be electricity, for that force is retained only on the surface of bodies, whilst OD is distributed throughout every particle of matter in its entirety.

From this it is evident that OD is a new force in science, and the sooner it is recognised by philosophers and investigated, the better for themselves now, and their fame hereafter.

Man, in the present state, is tied down by the knowledge furnished to the intellect by the five, or, according to the analysis of Dr. Thomas Brown, by the six senses—the perception by the muscles, according to that distinguished metaphysician and acute mental analyst, being different and entirely distinct from that of the sense of touch. The introduction of a new sense in the human economy was considered, at the time, a daring flight of genius; but physiologists now admit, as a matter of course, a sixth, or muscular sense, as another inlet to impressions from without for the elaboration of thought, by our intellectual and emotional natures.

Now, if in addition to these six senses God had endowed man with a seventh sense for the perception of OD, or the odic force, we should not only have stood on a higher level of knowledge than we do, but the moral sentiments and the religious emotions would have manifested themselves in purer and nobler forms. Deceit would then have been impossible, for we should have read off each other's hearts, and hypocrisy and intrigue would have slunk away. Honesty of purpose being found the best policy, Talleyrand and men of his class, could not then have used certain forms of speech, for the purpose of concealing and hiding the real nature of their thoughts, but man would have stood before his fellow man, and be known, even as he knew himself. In short, with this additional sense, man would have been a higher and a nobler being—fit peer of angels and of demi-gods from another, and a higher state of being.

Such, however, was not God's intention with man whilst he remained a denizen in this part of the universe. If, with the addition of one other sense only, such an improved nature could have been developed, what will take place, it is impossible to conceive, when man walks forth from his prison-house—the body—into spirit-life, when all the soul's faculties can be exercised without corporeal repression on the great volume of spiritual nature being spread out before him, in extent illimitable, and in duration without end.

THE Carrier Dore, published at Oakland, California, congratulates its readers "upon the growing evidence of the progress of Spiritualism in numerous new books and periodicals; and not only are the new journals sustained, but some of the older ones put on an appearance denoting enlarged circulations; among these is the Spiritual Offering."

ON SPIRITUAL INFLUENCES.

(Extracted from the Spiritual Offering.)

In this world we are spirits in earthly bodies and are, as such, subject to spiritual law; we are surrounded by spirits in affinity with us, and are open to their influence. Who these spirits are who may influence us in our affections and thoughts, is determined by our own affections, thoughts, and aspirations—like attracting like.

The influence of some spirits tends to elevate and purify, of others to deprave and debase; with the former we associate the higher kinds of spirit-control or mediumship; with the latter that of unprogressed and low spirits, such (1) as are in accord with an individual's own debased affections and will; and (2) such as obsess, or possess, an individual; the spirit having psychologised, or subjected him to his own debased will.

Mediums are especially open to spirit influence, and, therefore, ought to be careful as to the company they keep, and as to whom they receive at séances, when they yield to spirit-control; for every one with whom they come in contact is surrounded by his own sphere, charged with his own spiritual qualities.

Within the last few years many cases have occurred illustrating the power of unprogressed spirits upon mediums. Such cases have occurred at all times; instances of obsession are numerous in the history of Spiritualism, somewhat similar to that of the Gaderene.

Spirits in every kind of evil are constantly passing out of this into the spirit-world. Some Spiritualists there are who tell us that such are prevented from acting in the earth-sphere by some incomprehensible kind of spiritual police system; but that they can and do act upon us is proved by indisputable facts.

"Love turned to hate makes demons in the air;
Death does not conquer venom in their hearts;
On earth they live, abounding everywhere;
And there they subtly play their tragic parts."

Nothing provokes the enemies of mediums more than to suggest that the influence of unprogressed spirits may account for certain condemned incidents at séances, although such influences have been known, beyond cavil or dispute, to have been operative in many cases. These inimical men may, themselves, have attracted the evil influences which caused the very things attributed to the condemned medium, whose integrity may have been proved at hundreds of séances.

It behoves the student in spiritual science to study, by the light of fact and experience, the influence exerted by all orders of spirits, keeping ever in view the first principles stated at the beginning.

SPAIN.—At Valladolid, the organ of the Republican League admits a series of articles by Viscount Torres-Solanot, defending Spiritism against certain violent clerical denunciations.—At Huesca, the Iris de Paz announces a work by Madame D. y Soler, entitled "Spiritism: a Refutation of the Errors of Roman Catholicism," in reply to a work by a dignitary of the Church, entitled "Satanism," misrepresenting Spiritism.—Le Spiritisme.

BRAZIL.—The Spiritist Society, Concordia, established at Campos, Rio de Janeiro, have started an organ in the Press under the title of Século XX. (The Twentieth Century.) We find our consolatory doctrine well advocated in it, and that the humanitarian ideas which will prevail in the coming century are being well put forward by our brethren in belief, who discuss them in the public Press and in lectures.—Le Messenger.

RHODE ISLAND.—Mr. Hazard, of Rhode Island, informed the Banner of Light a short time ago that his correspondence on Spiritualism during the past twenty years, with two newspapers of Providence (R. I.), had filled fully forty of their columns. They were The Journal and the Evening Bulletin; their proprietors not only inserted them without charge, but furnished him with copies for distribution. The Journal had even permitted him to place conspicuously in their office a glass case containing pieces cut from the draperies of materialised spirits, with printed description of their origin.

ON SCEPTICS AT SEANCES.

"H. K.," a very well-known contributor to the Spiritual Offering, quotes Mr. Eglinton's letter which appeared a few weeks ago in "LIGHT," in which he declined to receive, at a materialisation séance, certain sceptics; on the ground that, whatever their honesty, they were not likely to be convinced at such a séance; that the result might be a deepening of their scepticism and condemnation of the medium. He thought that neophytes should first study manifestations which did not require the conditions for materialisation.

Upon this "H. K." remarks that, whatever Mr. Eglinton's experience may have been, that of other mediums, in America, has been that the presence of sceptics with honest minds is not an impediment to any manifestations, and that they are better fitted to be present at a materialisation séance than many who make a boast of their experience—Spiritualists of many years ago, who know nothing experimentally of more recent manifestations, and who have settled, a priori, that full form materialisations are "frauds."

"H. K." would advise Mr. Eglinton to admit to materialisation séances, neophytes, if candid and intelligent, in preference to any full-fledged adherents of this sort.

Our point, says "H. K.," is illustrated by the recent event at St. Louis. Mrs. Miller, whose genuine mediumship has been well established—witness Judge Portis' testimony at the prosecution,—held a séance under every condition required by the circle assembled. As it turned out, in the circle were certain Spiritualists of the kind just described, who came resolved to find out the "fraud" which they assumed was to be done, and who, having got what they came for, exhibited the same pitiless fury against the medium as if she had not submitted to all their own conditions.

Our understanding of the matter, continues "H. K.," is that their evil condition of mind and feeling attracted to the circle a corresponding order of spirits, whose influence, with their own inimical influence, overcame that of the medium's usual control; and that whatever "fraud" appeared was the work of their own spiritual confederates.

It is lamentable, "H. K." concludes, that another medium was concerned in the plot; lamentable indeed that, moved by some evil feeling, he should have sought to abuse a sister medium. Unhappily, this has not been uncommon in the history of our movement.

Mr. W. EGLINTON held a reception on Wednesday evening last, at 6, Nottingham-place, W., which was attended by, among others, Mrs. Patterson, Mrs. Shaw, Miss Frigeli, Hon. Mrs. Gore, Mr. Davies and the Misses Davies, Mr. F. Walker, Mr. C. W. Williamson, Mr. Colman, Mr. Tietkens, Mr. Debenham, Mr. Collingwood, Dr. and Miss Wyld, Colonel Lean, Lady Helena Newenham, Sir B. Leighton, M.P., Mr. Leonard, Signor Rondi, Mr. Cassall, Dr. and Mrs. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Farmer, Mr. and Mrs. Darter, Major Taylor, Mrs. Manning and the Misses Manning.

By bringing mortals and spirits into intelligent communion, the sting of death and the power of the grave are greatly lessened, the mystery of death disappears, the problem of the ages is solved, and man is understood to be, not a bubble sporting upon the sea of life for a moment, to be hurled into the black night of annihilation the next, but a permanent individuality to whom earth-life, with its varied changes, is but an incident in its endless journey of unfoldment.—Spiritual Offering.

The soul, the conscious, intelligent entity to whose mandate the material molecules and forces of the brain have yielded obedience; that power that has traced the evolution of material forms and familiarised itself with their laws; the conscious soul, from whose profound depths and lofty heights has been projected the light that illumines the mental world, the holy, unselfish devotion warning and beautifying all the avenues of human life; that soul is not the child of unconscious matter, but a ray from the "Divine reason," a vital fragment of the infinite, born of the spirit; its elements are indestructible, its life eternal. It is no new creation or transient formation, but, as Jesus said, "was with the Father before the world was."—Spiritual Offering.

The "Lancet" on Faith Healing.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The subjoined extract from the Lancet may be of interest in connection with what I have from time to time communicated respecting faith-healing. Not so long ago, if I am not much mistaken, the leading organ of medical opinion would not have been so tolerant in tone as it now is. Some cases of healing by faith we may assume on this authority to be facts: what we want now is to know how far this method is really serviceable in cases such, for instance, as that of cancer, to which it is claimed that such treatment can be applied with success. The writer in the Lancet does not seem very sure on this matter.—Faithfully yours,

M. A. ("OXON.")

There is no miracle in healing by faith; whereas it would be a miracle if, the organism being constituted as it is, and the laws of life such as they are, faith-healing did not, under favourable conditions, occur. The fallacy of those who proclaim faith-healing as a religious function lies in the fact that they misunderstand and misinterpret their own formula. It is the faith that heals, not the hypothesized source, or object, or faith outside the subject of faith. The whole process is self-contained. Nothing is done for the believer; his act of believing is the motor force of his cure. We all remember the old trick of making a man ill by persistently telling him he is ill until he believes it. The contrary of this is making a man well by inducing him to believe himself to be so. The number of the "miracles" performed will be the precise number of the persons who are capable of being thrown into a state of mind and body in which "faith" dominates the organic state. Pathologists will limit the area of this process to the province of functional disease; but we are not sure that they are justified by scientific facts in making this limitation. It must not be forgotten that function goes before organism in development, and that there are large classes of cases in which the disabilities of a diseased organ for a fair performance of its functions are mainly due to want of power or irregularity in action. And it is a fact in pathology, that, if the function of an organ be maintained or restored, much of the destructive metamorphosis due to proliferation of connective tissue, fatty deposit, or even certain forms of atrophic change in which the nuclei of cell-life are rather denuded than destroyed, may be arrested and to some extent repaired. The vis medicatrix nature is a very potent factor in the amelioration of disease, if only it be allowed fair play. An exercise of "faith," as a rule, suspends the operation of adverse influences, and appeals strongly through the consciousness to the inner and underlying faculty of vital force. There are many intractable cases in every practice which might be "cured by faith." It is well that these poor persons should be benefited by some means—it matters little what; if they can be "healed by faith" we ought to be very glad and thankful too, for the mistaken zeal of those who, being weak-minded themselves, make dupes of other weak-minded folk to their advantage. This is a blind leading of the blind in which they do not fall into the ditch, but, by a happy combination of circumstances, actually escape danger and gain something to boot.

Liebig's Experiment.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am much obliged to "Lily" for her courteous reply to my letter. I cannot but wish, however, that the authority that she is able to give for Liebig's alleged experiment were more direct. I believe I am right in saying that men of science know nothing of such an experiment as Dr. Wolfe dramatically narrates; and such of them as I have conversed with are very incredulous as to its ever having been attempted, not to say performed.

A SPIRITUALIST.

Astrology.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Will you allow me to introduce a subject interesting to very many people, and which, containing, as it certainly does, much truth, ought to be rescued from the obscurity and scorn which has been its lot for many years.—Astrology? If the numerous amateurs of the art among your readers would combine and exchange cards, or letters of inquiry, much good would ensue. If you will allow me I will ask your correspondent, "C. C. M." (who seems, from his letters to "LIGHT," to be an adept in the science), a fair question which may lead to some organisation. I address this inquiry to anyone who will reply either in "LIGHT," or privately. "Do you know from personal experience of a rapt parallel of Saturn, or Mars, or Uranus causing the death of anyone? Do you consider Secondary Directions (calculated from the daily motions of the sun and moon, giving a day for a year) to be as reliable as directions calculated by the semi-arc system, and pursued by the present and past Zadkiel?"—I remain, yours respectfully, EDOR.

The Value of a Personal Christ.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Though the abstract of my paper read before the Hermetic Society was very well made, yet one point was inadvertently omitted from the argument, which I regard as essential.

I argued that even when we are capable of forming a high ideal for ourselves, and contemplating it, the distance from such mere conception to the realisation in life is immense. And if we do not know that the ideal has been realised at least once, the aspiration after it is consistent with despair. We may regard such a character as only a beautiful dream of devout hearts, too far from the possibility of human attainment. But once believe that it is a realised actuality, and we may, though afar off, and with halting steps, joyfully follow where the blessed feet have trodden before. Besides, men will worship a Divine ideal incarnate outside themselves; if not Jesus Christ, then Koot Hoomi.

By virtue of exceptionally perfect attainment, I added, Jesus Christ, on leaving the earth, and entering Nirvana, became Lord and Sovereign of our race and dispensation, living Helper, Healer, Saviour, Object of prayer and worship, as well as Subject of devout meditation. When I shall see individuals and society growing into, and transcending the character of Jesus Christ as portrayed in the Gospels, then shall I admit that the Christian revelation has been superseded by a higher. But life, not dogma, is the criterion.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,
Anerley Park, June 21st, 1885. RODEN NOEL.

An Inquiry.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Can any of your readers help me to identify the persons and incidents described in the following words, spelt out by the tilting of a small table, under the hands of four perfectly honest, but sceptical persons, to whom the names and circumstances were quite unknown?

I believe that but a very small proportion of these cases has ever been verified. But, if they are quite fictitious, who invents them? Not one of the persons present could trace the most distant relation with a knowledge of either, and that most convenient but vague word telepathy does not seem applicable in such cases.

There was a little difficulty in getting the Polish (or Russian) names, which are probably incorrectly spelt. All the rest came with ease and decision.

Mr. Husk's Mediumship.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have been a Spiritualist for nearly twelve months, and thanks to my intimacy with Mr. Husk and his guides I have had a great number of tests. I was at one séance when Dr. Wyld's celebrated ring was put upon Mr. Husk's wrist, and I may add that I had previously been shown the ring and examined it. I have had forms and voices of relatives and friends appear and speak to me, but have had no direct evidence that they were the spirits they claimed to be, and as this subject of identification appears to me to be an important one, I have not assisted them in any way, but have been patiently waiting until some spirit friend would give me positive proof that he was actually the person he represented himself to be. This I think I obtained on Sunday evening last at Mr. Husk's house, when the form of a brother, who passed away a few years since, appeared at the table, the likeness being most distinct, and he gave his name ("Chris") and a message for my sister. This was a grand personal test, because no one in the room knew that I had ever had a brother named "Chris," and even if they had this would not account for the correctness of the likeness and for his sending a message to his favourite sister.—I am, &c.,

Unconscious Mediumship.

AS SHOWN IN A POEM BY JAMES SPEDDING.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The following poem by James Spedding (well known as the author of Lord Bacon's Life, "Evenings with a Reviewer," &c.) I have copied from Sir Henry Taylor's Autobiography. He says it was written upon the death of a dear friend when James Spedding was quite a young man, but was never shown to any one until he sent it to him, on some suitable occasion. I believe it will be entirely new to those of your readers who have not seen this autobiography, and it cannot fail to prove most interesting to all Spiritualists, because of the unconscious mediumship displayed throughout.—Yours, &c.

F. J. THEOBALD.

"In a still vision I do live;
I saw thee fade from the pure light;
I know the closed grave cannot give
Thy body to my sight.
I know thou canst not leave the gloom
Of that dark and jealous tomb.

"And yet thou art with me all the day;
Thy voice is ever in my ear,
Whate'er I do, or think, or say,
I feel that thou art near.
Thou leanest on me, even now,
With thy sweet and curbed brow.

"Unto the hour is fashioned
My task; unknown to thee, the spot.
This book I read, thou hadst not read,
These thoughts thou knewest not.
And yet I feel thee here with me,
Though here I know thou canst not be.

"I dream not. To mine inner eye
In a waking vision, still Rob'd in grace that cannot die
Thine image lives! and ever will,
With aspect of unfading cheer,
And placid eye, for ever clear."

Theosophy and Its Facts.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Considering the ill star which now flickers over the Headquarters of the Theosophical Society in India, it might appear ungenerous in my again drawing the attention of the readers of "LIGHT" to what follows; but as I am personally implicated, I use this as one means of expressing my deep regret for having published—on the strength of statements made by Madame Blavatsky—what now appears to be an unsubstantiated, if not untruthful account. At the time of publication I had no reason to doubt the veracity of the late editor of The Theosophist, and especially as Colonel Olcott, during his late visit to England, told me that the account was quite true.

In my recent work on "Egypt and the Wonders of the Land of the Pharaohs," p. 108, I gave a weird and sensational story, taken from The Theosophist for January, 1883, in order to show that magical power had not died out, as proved by a matter-of-fact relation of an actual occurrence in very recent times, written by Madame Blavatsky, who was one of the principals concerned. The article is entitled "Can the 'Double' Murder?" headed by "The story which follows is reprinted because the events actually occurred, and they possess a very deep interest to the student of psychological science, &c.—ED."

The historic facts are that Michael Obrenovich, the then reigning Prince of Servia, was murdered in Belgrade, along with his cousin Anka Konstantinovich, and her young daughter; (the dates and names are erroneously given by Madame Blavatsky), while walking in the park, on the 10th June, 1868.

According to Madame Blavatsky, "several persons innocent of the act, were, as is usual in such cases, imprisoned, and the real murderers escaped justice."

Then follows a sensational account of a séance at which the "double" of the medium, under the power of an old Servian matron, who had sworn to avenge the deaths of the murdered family, was made to go and "inflict mortal wounds upon the inner man [of the assassins] without puncturing the epidermis," and the manner in which it was done is graphically described. This is stated to have occurred eighteen months after the murders. Three days after Madame Blavatsky says: "I was sitting in the dining-room of a restaurant, and happened to pick up a newspaper. The first lines I read ran thus: 'Vienna, 186—.' Two Mysterious Deaths.—Last evening at 9.45, as P.—was about to retire, two of the gentlemen in waiting suddenly exhibited great terror, as though they had seen a dreadful apparition. They screamed, staggered . . . but presently fell writhing upon the floor, and expired in great agony," &c.

The point is to show the actual coincidence in time between this tragic act and the wonderful scenes enacted by the entranced medium in the Thebaid during the séance witnessed by Madame Blavatsky. The reason given for withholding the names and dates of the newspaper paragraph, is "that as nearly all the personages who figure in the story are still living, it is but decent I should withhold their names." Unfortunately for me I yielded to the cogency of the reasoning.

Now the actual facts, as taken from the Annual Register for 1868 (which was noticed in a recent review of my work on Egypt) and which I have verified by consulting a file of one of our local newspapers, are, that the Prince Michael Obrenovich, while walking in the park at 5 p.m. on June 10th, 1868, was met by three members of the Radonovich family, father and two sons, who fired with pistols at the Prince and the two ladies, his cousin and her young daughter. The Prince fell wounded, when the assassins attacked him with swords and completed the murder. The elder lady fell dead, and her daughter was mortally wounded. A son of one of the Court officials, accompanied by a friend, hearing a report of the pistols, went to the scene, and was shot by the assassins; but notwithstanding this, assisted by others who came up, he succeeded in arresting two of the assassins, father and son; the other son escaped but was arrested shortly after. The three, with ten others, who according to the confession of one of the assassins while in prison, were involved in a conspiracy to destroy the Prince, were brought to trial, and several of them were convicted and sentenced to death.

These historic accounts totally invalidate Madame Blavatsky's narrative, as to the escape of the assassins and their death by means of the "double" of the sensitive; and as neither the date nor the title of the newspaper which records the "Two Mysterious Deaths," is given, her statement is open to the most grave suspicion. As a psychological romance it is sensational in the highest degree, but as a narration of an "actual occurrence" it can no longer be received as possessing any historic value. How many of the marvels recorded from time to time in the Theosophical publications come under the same category as the above, is a question that I cannot solve, but if they rest upon no surer basis than the alleged re-incarnations of the Tibetan Llamas (to which I referred in a former number of "LIGHT"), and which is asserted by Mr. Sinnett, in his "Esoteric Buddhism," to be "a sober scientific fact," then, to my view, they are of too doubtful a character to be admitted as evidence of the marvellous powers alleged to be in possession of the Theosophical exponents of Mahatma wisdom and knowledge.

WILLIAM OXLEY.

Spiritualism in America.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Possibly a few words as to the cause of Spiritualism as it appears to a visitor in this part of the world may prove of interest to some of your readers.

I arrived in New York on May 10th, after a fairly favourable but rather rough passage in the Germanic, and came on to this city the following day, when I had the pleasure of again taking by the hand my old friend J. William Fletcher, by whom I was most cordially welcomed. I also very speedily received an equally cordially reception from his spirit control "Winona," who was as much an enfant of my affairs as I was myself, only much more so, and from her I received many messages of affectionate greeting, and of kindly interest from many of those dear to me on the spirit side of life.

On my second evening in Boston I went as a stranger to the séance of the Misses Berry, where I was cordially received by their courteous manager, Mr. Alboro.

It would be impossible, in the limits of this letter, to describe all that took place at that séance. Fully thirty spirits materialised, and these were of every kind and condition as regards age, height, dress, appearance, &c., &c. On one occasion two fully materialised spirits, one that of an Indian chief, the other that of a lady, brought the entranced medium out of the cabinet, and, one supporting her on each side, made the tour of the circle with her between them. Two spirits appeared at the curtain together and addressed me by name, but I failed to recognise them, although they gave me names that I was familiar with, of relatives who had passed away. A day or two after this I accompanied Mr. Fletcher to New York and Brooklyn, where he lectured ably and eloquently to crowded and appreciative audiences; and I accompanied him after that to Washington, where we were very cordially received, and found everywhere a desire to hear and understand more of Spiritualism. We stayed here for a few days and very much enjoyed some most friendly receptions that were got up for our benefit, and where I was called upon to give some of my own experiences as a Spiritualist, returning again to Boston by way of New York. Certainly I must say, that so far as I have been able to judge during my stay in America, Spiritualism does not occupy the same position that is accorded to it in England. As a rule, people don't shrug their shoulders, turn up their eyes, and look the other way when Spiritualism comes on the tapis, nor are they so ready to refer the thing to the working of the devil, as so many people do in England. I have generally remarked that there is a very intelligent spirit of inquiry as to the truth of the question, and, at such spiritual reunions as I have attended. I have found the company composed of intelligent ladies and gentlemen, very different indeed from the cranks and eccentricities that some smart writers would have the world believe are the only supporters of or believers in Spiritualism. I cannot do better than end this with an account of a most marvellous séance I had at Mrs. Ross's on the evening of 26th May, and which I sent to the Banner of Light for publication as under.

A TEST BEYOND PERADVENTURE.

To the Editor of the Banner of Light.

On Tuesday afternoon, May 26th, I had a séance with a trance medium, when a spirit that purported to be my mother controlled. She gave me ample evidence as to who she was; and I am as certain as I can be of anything in this world that my mother's spirit communicated with me. I think moreover that what happened subsequently would suffice to set at rest any doubt should such have existed in my mind. In the course of my conversation with her I said: "Mother, now that I am in America, I should be so pleased if you could let me see you and talk with you face to face"; and she replied: "Well, my dear son, I will do so. Say nothing to anyone of your intentions, but take an opportunity of going to Mrs. Ross's séance, for I think I can succeed in coming to you there. If I can, I will prove my identity by giving you my spirit name, and will remind you of our present talk."

As requested, I said nothing to any human being, but left the trance medium at six o'clock and went to my rooms, where I referred to the Banner to see what evening Mrs. Ross gave her séances. I found that she would give one that same evening at eight o'clock, so I went there at that hour. I went as a perfect stranger, much doubting whether my mother would be able to fulfill her promise so speedily. After two or three spirits had materialised, the spirit of a lady appeared at the curtain and Mrs. Ross said: "This spirit calls for some one of the name of Meugens." I at once stepped forward to the curtain, when the spirit took me by one hand and placed her other hand on my shoulder, saying: "My son, my dear son, you have come as I requested, and I want you to know that I am in truth your own dear mother. Remember the conversation that we had this very afternoon when I controlled a certain medium (giving the name) and the spirit name (giving it also) that I promised I would give you as a test." She then conversed with me quite at length about several family matters, put her arms round my neck, kissed me lovingly, and then bidding God bless me, disappeared. I may add that my mother passed to spirit-life when I was but five years old, so that I could scarcely be expected to recognise her without such wonderful tests as those she had prepared for me.

For the benefit of those who are sceptical, I would remark that I have but lately arrived from India, have been but a week or two in your city, have never so much as seen Mrs. Ross in my life before, and had no more idea on the morning of the 26th of May that I should see and converse with my mother (who has been forty years in the spirit world) before night, than I had of finding myself back in India by that time.—Yours for the truth,
J. G. MEUGENS.

I hope to be able to attend some of the camp meetings during the summer, and should I meet with any further experiences I shall be very glad to send them on to you for publication if you think they would interest your readers.

Yours affectionately,

Boston, June 10th, 1885.

EVOLUTION AND SPIRITUALISM.

The unveiling of the statue of Charles Darwin, by Professor Huxley, in the entrance-hall of the Natural History Museum, South Kensington, on Tuesday, June 10th, marked an epoch in the progress of scientific speculation, has once more directed universal attention to the works and life-labours of the illustrious naturalist, and has led thoughtful men again to reflect on the prejudices which, for a longer or shorter period, attempt to bar the progress of new truths in every department of human inquiry.

The theory of evolution expounded and defended by the laborious researches of Charles Darwin is but the outcome and fruit of the preceding labours of Lord Monboddo, Erasmus Darwin, Lamarck, Matthew, the brothers St. Hilaire, Goethe, and the author of the "Vestiges of Creation."

Between Lamarck and Charles Darwin the greater part of a century has elapsed, and the despised evolutionists of fifty years ago are succeeded by the possibly over-estimated evolutionists of the present day. Fortunately, time is ever on the side of truth, and the seeming truths of antiquity are rapidly giving place to the demonstrations of to-day.

Among the many lessons to be learned from the life of Charles Darwin, is the important one of the value of indefatigable industry, combined with the equally important features of sterling integrity and intellectual honesty.

Charles Darwin sought truth for truth's sake, and propounded his facts with the utmost fearlessness of personal consequences. His wisdom, which might be termed prudence, was equally pronounced, for, whilst his facts and experiments were scattered broadcast with the utmost unreserve, his theories were all broached tentatively, and without any obtrusiveness to make them unnecessarily offensive to scientists and theologians, who held mechanical views of creation diametrically opposed to those now known as evolution.

The true philosophy of propagandism is firmly to establish facts and leave theories, with a little aid, to take care of themselves.

Evolution has cast pregnant thoughts into every department of biological, psychological, and theological inquiry, and modified each of them to an extent as momentous as were the modifications of the ancient theories of cosmogony by the teachings of Kepler, Copernicus, Galileo, and Newton.

Darwin, without creating the prejudice which is generally attached to the teachings of violent propagandists, has, by his placid and truthful nature, succeeded in making terribly unpopular opinions popular, not so much directly by his own efforts, as by the energetic aid of some of the foremost biologists in the world, notably Huxley and Fiske, who, by their courageous statements of theories, based on Darwin's facts, directed general attention to the subject.

Haeckel, on the other hand, with his equally, perhaps more profound researches, has, by his unconcealed and bitter antagonism to Old World theories, and by the promulgation of very extreme biological views, in many instances prevented the acceptance of the doctrine of evolution, whilst the more modest teachings of Darwin have been heartily accepted.

Evolution and Spiritualism in many respects closely resemble each other. They are both in direct antagonism to the common scientific and theological teachings of the age. The acceptance of either theory strikes at the root of the current dogmas of science and theology.

Evolution requires, on its acceptance, that the commonly received opinions of biology and psychology be recast; and the facts of modern Spiritualism demand a complete remodelling of the fundamental principles of physics and psychology.

Evolution recognises the introduction and progress of life as a progressive development, according to universal law; and Spiritualism demonstrates that the generally accepted theories of physics and psychology should be largely extended.

Evolution has thrown intellectual dynamite into every intellectual camp, and has caused an entire rearrangement of their fundamental principles; and spiritual phenomena have, as far as they have been received, performed the same task in reference to biology, psychology, and theology.

All that Spiritualism wants is a Darwin and a Huxley, or many Darwins and many Huxleys—the former to observe and classify facts, the latter to engage in popular propagandism, and the triumphs of evolution would pale in comparison with the irresistible advance of Spiritualism.

The Times, in its admirable leader on the unveiling of the Darwin statue, says, speaking of Darwin and his theories: "It has served, and will serve, as a lesson to those minds which naturally and, as it were, by instinct are inclined to take up a position of hostility to new doctrines. It has taught them, and will continue to teach, that discovery is constantly progressing, and that views as to the nature of the universe which seem tenable in one stage of our knowledge cease to be tenable in the next. The corollary is obvious. It is that all scientific hypotheses which are put forward cautiously, reverently, and after a serious attempt to master the facts, should be met at least in a courteous and respectful spirit." These pregnant words should be pondered by the prejudiced opponents of the demonstrated facts of modern Spiritualism.

FROM private advices received, we believe it is the intention of Mrs. M. E. Williams, of New York, to sail for England on the 12th July. Mrs. Williams is an excellent materialising medium of considerable repute, but if it is her intention to give public or indiscriminate sances for this delicate phase of mediumship, we warn her of the danger attending such a course.

A SPIRITUALIST and journalist of many years' standing, desires to engage in literary work of any kind. Manuscripts prepared for and put through the Press. Computations, abstracts, and critiques supplied, &c. References to Rev. W. Stainton Moses, M.A. ("M. A. Oxon."), Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, of National Press Agency, and many others.

We are asked to make the following announcement:—On Sunday evening at seven o'clock Mrs. Groom will deliver a trance address at Cavendish Rooms, 51, Mortimer-street. It is stated that the control will be "George Dawson," the famous Birmingham preacher and lecturer when in the body, and that he has intimated his wish that any one who knew him in the past may be present, and endeavour, as many others have successfully done, to gather evidences of identity. The subject announced is, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Mrs. Groom will describe spirits in her normal state at the close.—A. M.

ON THE RECOVERY OF LOST PROPERTY BY SPIRIT AGENCY.

The following account of a séance with Mr. Eglinton will, I think, prove interesting to the readers of "LIGHT."

On Monday, the 8th inst., a friend and myself sat with Mr. Eglinton, at 6, Nottingham-place, W., for slate-writing, and after obtaining a number of replies to questions asked, both on the locked slate and on ordinary slates held sometimes on, and sometimes under the table, we were anxious to know if Mr. Eglinton's guides would pass a coin from the locked slate to one held beneath the table. I have had in my possession some time an old Irish halfpenny very much worn. It has a harp with the letters H I B (the only ones legible) on one side, the King's Head with I U S I V on the other. This I took from my pocket and placed in the locked slate which Mr. Eglinton held on the table, and another ordinary slate underneath. We received an answer to a question asked aloud on the slate held under the table, also the words, "There is not sufficient power to move the coin." I accordingly unlocked the slate, and put the halfpenny back in the right-hand pocket of my trousers, with some other coppers. I left London that evening, and shortly after leaving Waterloo Station, found that the old Irish halfpenny was not in my pocket. As I had bought a paper, and paid away two or three other coppers, I concluded I had stupidly paid this halfpenny away by mistake. On Monday last, the 15th inst., I again sat with Mr. Eglinton, this time alone, and in the course of conversation the previous séance was alluded to, and Mr. Eglinton said he wished the guides had been able to pass the coin. I said that, oddly enough, I had lost it the same evening, and supposed it was gone for good. No more was said about it, and I asked the question aloud, "Is anyone present whom I know by name?" Mr. Eglinton holding an ordinary slate under the corner of the table for the reply, writing was heard, the usual three taps denoting the completion of the sentence were given, and on the slate being placed on the table the message was: "Would you like to know where your Irish halfpenny is?" I replied orally, "Yes, please." And Mr. Eglinton again held the slate as before; another communication was at once given. "We will try to get it for you." I now took the slate with the Bramah lock, wrote a message addressed to a deceased friend, and locked the slate, which Mr. Eglinton held on the table, his left hand and both my hands being joined on the slate, his right hand holding an ordinary slate under the edge of the table. Mr. Eglinton was now very strongly controlled, and said that something unusual must be taking place, as so much vitality was being drawn from him. The locked slate, which we held on the table, was perceptibly tilted up, and, after sitting for, I should say, five or six minutes, writing was heard on the slate held under the table, and the message on it proved to be a pertinent answer to the question asked in the locked slate. I then opened the Bramah-locked slate to rub out the question written in it. Inside the slate, lying close to the wooden frame, was my Irish halfpenny, lost the previous Monday. Of this I am certain, that I placed the halfpenny in my pocket on taking it from the slate on Monday, the 8th inst., between 11.30 and 12 o'clock, and that it was not in any of my pockets or anywhere about me on my arriving home at 7.30 that evening, nor had I any knowledge of its whereabouts between then and Monday, the 15th, when it was placed in the slate.—I remain, yours faithfully,
June 16th, 1885. C. B. HANKEY.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXIII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Nonconformist and Independent must be credited with an uncommon liberality for giving a very handsome notice to Miss Theobald's nice stories, "Bob and I,"* and "More Forget-me-Nots,"* and "Spirit Messages relating to the Nature of Christ's Person,"* as well as Mr. Morell Theobald's "Spiritualism at Home."* The notice closes with the remark that "any one really desirous of inquiring into the subject [of Spiritualism] could hardly do better than read these four books." The difficulty is to imagine that any person could be otherwise than "really desirous of inquiring into" such a subject as the reality of Spiritualism!

The committee of the Swedenborg Society reports that 2,132 volumes of the great Seer's works have been sold, and 2,844 presented, chiefly to libraries and clergymen, during the past year. Here is a method worth considering. Dr. Nichols' Herald of Health is regularly placed upon the tables of more than 300 libraries and clubs, and so read by thousands. It would not cost much to give "LIGHT" a similar circulation. No mode of propagandism would be so inexpensive and effective, because it would make an immediate demand for more information.

A wealthy gentleman of Boston, U.S.A., has built, and presented to his fellow Spiritualists, a Spiritual Temple, with lecture, lyceum, and séance rooms, very spacious and complete. A more splendid Spiritualist church is by a similar liberality being erected in California. Some organisation of the vast body of Spiritualists is inevitable. Let us hope that it will be carried out by the spirits themselves, who know their work, and can find the means of doing it. We cannot make a tree—it must grow.

A friend has kindly sent me a copy of the Glasgow Observer, a Roman Catholic newspaper, containing a sermon by Father Noonan—a "brilliant discourse," in which the "spirit rappers" are "exposed"—that is, he "proceeded to deliver before a very large congregation, a singularly lucid, interesting, and instructive exposition of the irrational and irreligious character and tendencies of the doctrines taught by modern Spiritualists."

And that, I take it, was a remarkably good thing to do, and I wish there were a little more of it. Denunciations excite curiosity, create interest, and promote any cause which is worth promoting. If the entire clergy, leading and guiding the 107 registered sects in the United Kingdom, would follow Father Noonan's example, and all the utterances got as well reported, we should see a wonderful expansion of spiritual light and knowledge.

"One of the Fathers of the Church," Father Noonan says, "called the devil God's monkey, always counterfeiting Him in order to supplant Him in the hearts of men, who, losing their faith, study magic, divination, and the occult arts. From Pharaoh's magicians to Cagliostro, people who fell away from the faith became infected with a belief in diabolic wonders. Voltaire and Bolingbroke prepared men for mesmerism, and those who deny the miracles of the Bible believe in those of spirit-rapping."

"Spiritualism," says the eloquent Father, "is simply execrable. It ignores the Church; it holds converse with the dead." True, the Catholic Church holds converse with the dead. It prays for holy souls in purgatory, and it honours and invokes the dead who are happy, but Catholics "do not disturb the repose of the dead by putting to them sacrilegious questions. There is nothing more laudable than to assist the dead—nothing more Pagan than to consult the dead." Moses and Isaiah denounced the Spiritualists of their times, and King Josiah banished all the mediums.

"In the time of Tertullian," says this interesting Father Noonan, "in the third century the dead were grossly insulted by operations intended to force them to communicate the secrets of the other world to the living, by the movements of a hat or rapping on a table, but it was the devil that gave the answers. It is the same now." "I grant that answers are received," says Father Noonan, "but whence do they come? From devils—not devils in hell, but from those demons in the air who are all around us, and are employed in leading men astray."

Father Noonan is something "ashamed of the age he lives in when people claim as a recent discovery a superannuated imposture like Spiritualism—a superstition as old as the world," and then he goes on to describe this religion of necromancers and jugglers. "Spiritualism," he says, "has its catechism, just as the Catholic Church has. What was its Trinity? God, matter, and spirit. What was its Incarnation? Man passing through a series of experiences in order to purify himself. What was the redemption of Spiritualism? It had none—it could not have any. Why? Because it denied the fall of Adam, and it denied that Adam was the father of the human race. Consequently, too, it rejected the doctrine of original sin—according to the Spiritualists the only original sin for man was that which he himself committed, and which he might expiate in some new and future existence. Hence, too, the soul of the sinner, when the man died, went to — where? Into the body of some inferior animal. The soul of a king might enter the body of a slave. What was the hell of the Spiritualists? It was simply a negation of the true hell, for the very first object of the adepts of the system was to annihilate altogether the idea and doctrine of eternal punishment. What was the purgatory of Spiritualism? The migration of the sinful soul into the body of some inferior animal, and going on through existence after existence until it purified itself at last and ascended, according to the doctrine of metempsychosis, unto that point from which it descended. What was the Paradise of Spiritualism? Its paradise meant an eternal promenade—a voyage of pleasure without end from one planet on to the other. What was the Devil of Spiritualism? Simply 'a jumping-Jack.' Spiritualism had no wicked spirit—thus verifying the saying of an old writer that, 'while the triumph of God was to reveal Himself, the triumph of the devil was to deny himself.'"

After this luminous account of the religion of Spiritualism, the good Father pitches into its morals, and compares the Decalogue of Sinai with that of "this infernal revelation." One commands us to adore God; the other says He is sufficiently adored already, and that forms of worship are indifferent to Him. The one tells them to sanctify Sunday (!); the other denies that God requires any sacrifices. The one commands children to honour their parents and obey their masters; the other tells them that all inequalities of our social condition must disappear."

The droll thing is that a Roman Catholic priest should tell a large congregation, and a much larger number of newspaper readers, that murder and suicide are considered mere trifles by Spiritualists; that abortion is not worth talking about—that, in short, it made light of all crimes, utterly destroyed the sacred ties of family relationship, and most horribly insulted the dead. Yet the adepts and adherents of this monstrous doctrine are to be counted by thousands in Europe alone. And "this pretended religion of Spiritualism is, to a very great extent, the work and result of secret societies—a net-work which the devil had cast over the earth to upset social order"—and so on.

St. Paul says something about the "foolishness of preaching," but it may be doubted if he ever heard, or read, quite such a sermon as Father Noonan's. It is true that some Protestant papers denounce Spiritualism as the work of the devil. In this they are hand in hand with Father Noonan—but Catholics are not all alike any more than Protestants. As the Church, as represented by the Pope, or in Councils, has made no decision in regard to Spiritualism, opinion is free, and bishops and priests are free to differ. In this matter Cardinal Manning differs widely from the late Cardinal Wiseman, and there are bishops and priests not only tolerant of, but deeply interested in, Spiritualism.

As to priests or ministers like Father Noonan, if we had Acts of Parliament now in force like some in the Tudor times, mediums would be burnt, and these fanatics would light the faggots.

I am very glad to hear that the S.P.R. is about to enter upon another phase or method of investigation. Thought-reading, haunted houses, apparitions, are interesting subjects, no doubt. There is an abundance of authentic ghost stories. The trouble about all the old ones is that we cannot examine and cross-examine the witnesses. As to recent ones, when a ghost is seen by only one person, how can we prove its objective reality?

The phenomena of witchcraft—taking the testimony which satisfied a judge like Sir Matthew Hale for example, and the juries that found verdicts under his direction—are well worth a more careful consideration than has been given to them. We ought to know, so far as facts two centuries old can be known why the most enlightened jurists and statesmen of the most enlightened countries hanged men, women, and even children for witchcraft.

Also we ought to know, at a time when our translations of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament have undergone revision by the most learned men of our time, what amount of credence we should give to the so-called supernatural elements of both. For example, witchcraft and necromancy are forbidden under terrible penalties in the Old Testament, with the sanction of "Thus saith the Lord!" Disprove the possibility of witchcraft and necromancy, and your revised Bible is only a literary curiosity. Therefore a Society for Psychical Research should interest all who care for the Bible.

The new method of investigation upon which the Society is about to enter, is the examination of witnesses as to extraordinary facts. Clear-minded, intelligent men and women are to give their testimony, as in a court of law, as to what they have seen, heard, and felt. Of course there will be, in every case, a thorough cross-examination. As in the investigation of reported miracles at Rome, there will be a Devil's Advocate to break down the case if possible. The Society will not need to go outside its own body for the cross-examiners. There are members trained at the bar, and familiar with the methods of the Old Bailey.

Of course we can read the testimony of very able, very intelligent, very scientific men, as to their observation of the phenomena of spiritual séances; but it is probable that nine readers in ten would like to ask them a few questions. When Mr. Alderman Barkas gave his testimony in a lecture at Langham Hall, he was sharply cross-questioned from the gallery. In the reports of the S. P. R. we shall have question and answer, until in the mouths of many witnesses every word shall be established.

And, while we are about it, why not make these testimonies—these dramas of truth-finding as public as our courts of law? Why not admit spectators? Why not try the case Spiritualism v. Materialism in a court organised ad hoc, with all legal formalities? Of course there could be no compulsion, but it may be presumed that the many able and distinguished witnesses of the phenomena of Spiritualism for the past twenty years, would cheerfully give their testimony. Of course, the expenses could be met by a moderate charge for admission.

Let us suppose that Mr. Eglinton, for instance, were put on trial for fraud in psychography or materialisations, and formally tried. The testimony would require several sessions, and would be intensely interesting, while a verbatim report of the case would be one of the best books possible for general circulation. A trial in which both sides are represented has a fine dramatic interest, of which Shakespeare and other writers of plays, and even of comic operas, have availed themselves. And it is time that Spiritualism should be popularised. Not one person in ten thousand can personally examine the facts of the most important sciences, but when these are established by a few competent observers, they can be taught to every body. This is true of religion as well. How few were the personal witnesses of the miracles of the Old or New Testament, yet how many millions have accepted them upon such testimony. Our miracles of today have been seen by vast numbers—but yet there are millions who must rely upon the evidence of others. It follows that this evidence should be carefully collected and widely circulated.

The Christian, of June 11th, is "Faith-Healing" all over. It pervades the advertising columns. The reading matter is full of it. Will it empty the hospitals—even the Hospital for Incurables? A sermon on "The Principles of Faith-Healing" says all disease is sin and came in with the Fall, by Satan's personal agency. Every diseased person is under the devil's dominion. The test of his faith in Christ is his being cured. No true Christian, therefore, can suffer from any disease. We are not to trust to doctors or drugs. "A hopeless case is more hopeful than one in which we think we can do anything of ourselves for cure," &c.

At the late Conference, the question was raised: "Is it right for any believer to bring up his son as a doctor?" As it happened, two medical men present on the platform were faith-healers—whether they had ceased to give medicines was not stated; but it was strongly urged that as Christ healed all manner of sicknesses, all Christians should be healed. "The death of Christ destroys the root of all sickness, which is sin." There is abundant testimony from England, America, Europe, Australia. Lord Radstock is a faith-healer. In Switzerland and Germany the persons healed by faith are counted by thousands.

Sad to say, other religious journals denounce the whole thing as imposture or delusion. They could scarcely be more bitter if it were Spiritualism. "Look at our facts," cry the Faithists. "Every delusion is full of facts," say the infidels. "Did not Christ and His disciples heal the sick?" "The day of miracles is past." "No, Christ is always the same. It has returned." But we must leave the Christian, which upholds, and the Christian Commonwealth, which denounces, Faith-Healing, to settle the question between them.

The Commonwealth classes Faith-Healing with witchcraft, astrology, and Spiritualism, and says: "It is only when exploring such a field as this that one can realise how credulous, and foolish, and imbecile, the human mind is capable of becoming. How the unenlightened people of ancient Egypt could invest a four-footed beast with Divine attributes, and worship it as a deity; or the philosophers of classic Greece bow down to images of wood, or of silver and gold; or our own forefathers, the contemporaries of Milton and Shakespeare, put women to death by the thousand on the ground that they were witches—all this seems to us to be incomprehensible and impossible. Equally mysterious will it be to future ages that the English people of the nineteenth century could believe in disease being cured by denying its existence. No limits can be set to the credulity of fanaticism."

The Commonwealth denounces the "Christian Scientists" and their "mind cure" as another delusion, and at the close of a trenchant leader says: "Experience proves that Atheism and corruption in their worst forms have always flourished most in those times and countries where the priest and the impostor have longest held sway."

Well, what are we to do in such a controversy? Simply examine the facts. If people are cured by belief, by mental impressions—if tumours, cancer, blindness, deafness, and paralysis, suddenly disappear by mental, moral, or spiritual causes, the fact is worth knowing. We say constantly, examine the facts of Spiritualism. Examine equally the miracles of Faith-Healing. Whatever is real will bear the most critical—the most scientific—investigation. The Christian Commonwealth says: "The study of these aberrations of the human mind, however interesting they may be psychologically, can only give pain to the thinker and the moralist." The Scripture says: "Prove all things—hold fast to that which is good." That is all we ask for Spiritualism.

REV. B. B. WAKE writes from Malvern Link to say: (1) That he has not been lecturing on Spiritualism at Malvern; (2) that the Vicar of Yeovil has not been at Malvern, and of course did not take the chair; (3) that he never said or thought that spiritual phenomena would herald the Millennium; and (4) that while he admits their reality, he believes them to be a revival of ancient necromancy, against which the penalty of death was denounced in the Old Testament. Our note was based upon a newspaper report which must be held responsible for all these queer misstatements.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

The discussion of the Hon. Roden Noel's paper on the "Historical Element in Christianity," adjourned from the 10th inst., was resumed on the 17th by Mr. Edward Maitland in a paper entitled "The Intention and Method of the Gospels," of which the following is an abstract.

That the Gospels not only do not present the actual life and character of any historical personage whatever, but were not intended to do so, and that the greatest pains were taken to show that they were not so intended, appears from a variety of reasons. Among these are their absolutely irreconcilable and mutually exclusive statements in respect of every distinctive point of importance. The genealogies, the immaculate conception, the miraculous birth, the enrolment under Cyrenius, the persecution by Herod and massacre of the children, the flight into Egypt, the passion, crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, and, in short, whatever has been regarded as constituting an actual history of an exceptional Person, disappears before an intelligent and candid criticism, and leaves no trace behind, so far as the historical plane is concerned. And the partisans of the orthodox presentation, in their attempts to harmonise the Gospels, and vindicate their historical character, have exhausted ingenuity and outstripped candour, but without success.

Nor is this the only class of evidence. All the leading characteristics of the Gospels, their incidents, utterances, and doctrines, were ascribed to the corresponding characters in other religions—to Osiris, Krishna, Mithras, Buddha and others—and the entire story of the Gospels taught to their initiates in times long anterior to the Christian era, even the cross being used as a symbol to denote the attainment of the life eternal through the renunciation—or "crucifixion"—of the lower nature. So that the sacred mysteries of Egypt, Greece, and other lands, their rites, ceremonies, and symbology generally, were laid under contribution for terms wherewith to relate the life of a supposed Galilean peasant, purporting to be written by Galilean fishermen.

There is, nevertheless, an explanation which not only saves at once the credit of the Gospels and the truth of Christianity, and is in accordance with the whole tenour and method of Holy Scriptures, but which also lifts Christianity to a position commanding and indefeatable, and from which, when once established thereon, it can never decline.

This is the explanation that the Gospels are designed to be, not historical, but mystical; not biographical, but allegorical; not to describe an individual, but to present an ideal; not to relate a particular history, but to promulgate an eternal verity; not to deal with persons, places, times, and events appertaining to the physical plane and appealing to the senses, but to deal with principles, states, and processes which are spiritual, and appeal to the soul. Their theme, in short, was not a man, but Man; and this, not Man physical and external, of time and of place, but Man spiritual, interior, and mystical, superior to all limitations, Man Regenerate, wherever and in whomsoever occurring.

A proof of this is to be found, among others, in the declaration of Jesus himself to Nicodemus,—"Except a man be born again of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. Ye must be born again." That is to say, the condition of salvation for all men is a birth identical with the miraculous one ascribed to himself. Water is the mystical symbol for the soul, which is called the woman, as being the substance or "mother" of the man. And the soul is the residence of the spirit, which is the life or "father" of the man. Spirit, when pure, is God; and the soul, when pure, secretes or "polarises" to pure spirit or God. Wherefore, to be "born again," and become regenerate "of water and of the Spirit," is to be re-constituted—not of matter and its life—but of a pure soul and the Divine life. Being of the soul, this Divine potency is called the "Seed of the Woman." Man, according to Hermetic doctrine, contains within himself the seed of his own regeneration, and the power to make it effective. This is done by subordinating his lower self, and uniting his own will with the Divine will. But the soul, or "water," is also called Maria, and when pure is called Virgin; and Spirit, when pure and Divine, is called, when in operation, Holy Ghost. So that "born of water and the Spirit" is an equivalent expression to "born of the Virgin Mary and the Holy Ghost;" and Jesus, in declaring the necessity of such a birth, declares both that others must be born as he was, and that he himself was not a physical but a spiritual being. That is, the personality denoted by the name Jesus is not his exterior, physical, and "historical" part, but his interior and spiritual nature, the regenerated selfhood, that wherein the man is "saved," himself reconstituted of the Divine substance and life, and made superior to the limitations of matter.

What is called the "revelation of Christ" to the world was, then, the disclosure of the mystery which, from the beginning of the dispensation, or first rise of the Church, had been in the world, having been implied in the promise represented as given to Eve, as type of the soul immergent into matter—the promise that she should yet bruise the head of the serpent, matter, and her seed—man regenerate—should, as the Apocalypse says, make war with the dragon and get the victory over him.

The great spiritual wave, or new flood of intuition, which resulted in Christianity, had for its function the fulfilment of the great "week," or seven cycles of man's spiritual creation, of which the first was denoted by the story of Eden, and the last by that of Christ. The purpose of the Gospels was to represent—after mystical usage—in a dramatic allegory, the state or stage at which the spiritual consciousness of the elect generally had then arrived, namely, the perception of the true idea of the Christ; and the disclosure of the truth that man's real Redeemer, whether called Osiris, Mithras, Messiah, Buddha, the man from the East, or the Lord from Heaven, is no mighty angel or God incarnate, no earthly conqueror or prince, no fleshly or extraneous personage whatsoever, but a new spiritual creation in man himself, occurring by a process of involutions evolution, a process provided for, indeed, in the constitution of existence, but requiring for its accomplishment the co-operation of the individual with the spirit within him.

Of the state thus attained, the state of Christhood, Jesus was a type. Neither Church nor world, however, was yet fit for the apprehension of the idea. It would therefore be in the world, but the world would not know it. Hence the ascription to Jesus of expressions denoting the necessity of a yet further revelation concerning him than his disciples could then bear, when the full recognition of the truth would constitute his "second advent." It was necessary that the world first arrive intellectually at the conception of creation by physical evolution before it could discern intuitively the corollary of this doctrine in that of redemption through the supplementary and complementary process of spiritual evolution—the process, that is, of which "Christ" is at once the condition and result. Representing, as it does, the spiritual maturity of the individual soul, it is attained only after a prolonged experience of earth lives, and is rendered possible, therefore, only by a multiplicity of rebirths. For regeneration must be not only begun, but carried to a certain advanced stage while yet in the body. Wherefore, without such repeated re-incarnation, the Gospel of Christ would be a gospel not of salvation but of perdition to the race at large. Only when at length "Christ is formed" in man, is he set free of matter and of the necessity of a return to the body.

Concerning the authorship of the Gospels, the conclusion is that they were the work of the Mystics, or "advanced men," of the time, who, having their headquarters at Alexandria, and seeing no other way to save religion from extinction through the spread of Materialism—for the times nearly resembled our own—resolved, under Divine impulsion, to give the world a system, at once new and complete, representing the highest possibilities and satisfying the highest aspirations of humanity. To this end they created a suitable character, accumulating upon it all that had been predicted of the Christ of the past, and grafted their system upon Judaism, intending it to be regarded, not as superhuman, but as representing the highest human. Doubtless, artist-like, they selected the best models available, and such as their own ranks only could supply; but also, artist-like, they did not confine their portraiture to these, their object being to represent an ideal, and not to glorify an individual. And if, indeed, as may well be the case, they had some special figure in view, certain it is that the last thing they would have approved would be the attempt to drag him to light and exalt him to be the object of idolatry,—to judge by the pains they took to obliterate all traces of his identity. Representing him as teaching by parables, they made of his history a parable also.

The subsequent destruction of the library of the Serapion by the Christians, on the pretext that it contained documents dangerous to the new religion, becomes, in view of this explanation, an incident of no little significance. It contained the writings from which the human origin of the religion could be proved.

An interesting conversation followed, in the course of which the president described in detail several of the leading discrepancies in the Gospels, and other New Testament narratives, referring especially to the late Mr. W. R. Greg's writings on the subject as excellent alike for their critical skill and their reverent spirit.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM ASSOCIATION OF INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM (81, Wells-street, Camberwell).—It is intended to hold meetings on the first Sunday in each month at seven o'clock. Miss Reeves has kindly arranged to give an address on Sunday, July 5th. Mr. Eglinton and Mr. Towns have also promised to assist on future occasions, notice of which will be given in due course. The committee would be glad of the support of any friends willing to offer their services. The Association have to thank the secretary of the London Spiritualist Alliance and Mr. Eglinton for gifts of books to the library. Any contributions will be gratefully received.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.—The address announced for delivery on "What is the New Religion?" was delivered at the Kensington Town Hall, on Sunday evening last. A quarter of an hour was first devoted to answering questions put by the audience, which were replied to in a lucid and able way. The discourse which followed was powerful and was listened to with interest. Some people, it was stated, objected to the use of the word "religion," and others objected to the term "new" religion. Religion treated of the relation of the human soul to the Divine. It was founded on true and immutable principles. There could not be two true religions, one old and the other new, but there might be varied expressions of the same central truth, and in that sense we may speak of an old religion as distinguished from a later and newer form. The fundamental principles are one and the same, but the developments may be various. Who can object to a new expression of religion? Who can say that the forms existing are all-sufficient? Have not endless cruelties and bloodshed been committed in the name of religion, and even in that of the later form—Christianity itself? Is there not some need of some new form suitable to the present hour? The new religion is not addressed to those who are perfect. Christ said, "I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance." If the precepts of Christianity were truly followed, if every man did to others as he would be done by, if every one were forgiving and unselfish, the Millennium would indeed be in our very midst, and there would be no need of any new religion. A new light is beginning to dawn like the early streaks of morning on the horizon. The light will be shed on all humanity; it will dwell in the hearts of all. It will be wrapped in no form or creed, and will require no altar or temple. The new religion teaches us immortality. It removes the dread of death. It opens out our vista beyond the grave, and teaches us that death is an enlarged existence, and that loving spirits are around us and sympathise with us. It leads us to look beyond this world, to learn to be unselfish, to love to do good, to aid and assist others, to relieve the distressed, to pity the criminal and the suffering.—After the address an impromptu poem was given on the subject of the entrance of the spirit into spirit-life. It was announced that the subject of the discourse for next Sunday would be "Spiritual States and Angelic States: their Relation to the New Religion."

RECORDS OF PHENOMENA WANTED.

We shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

Mesmerism.	Communion with the Departed.
Trance.	Materialised Spirit Forms.
Clairvoyance.	The Spirit Rap.
Thought-reading.	The Spirit Voice.
Apparitions.	Spirit Writing.
The Human "Double."	Automatic Writing.
Presence at a Distance.	Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact.
Haunted Houses.

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.

IN Boston there are now more than a dozen Spiritualist meetings held regularly, all well attended by listeners who can spread intelligence and experience among others. This implies extending interest in Spiritualism. Then there are very numerous private as well as public circles, which are meetings on a small scale. There are, at least, six circles for materialisation all constantly well attended.—Spiritual Offering.

THE materialist philosophy denies the immortality of the soul, and sweeps away various traditions of the past with the superstitious aspects of religion. But side by side with it there is, in the present day, a keen desire to know whether there is any ground for believing that we have a spirit which survives the shock of death, and whether there is a spirit world beyond into which we enter; and whether there are points of contact between this world and that, with intercommunication between them.—REV. H. R. HAWES.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliottson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edwards, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavaire, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this: What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which diverse circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.R.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance, of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not blinded by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROWEY F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men who have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able believers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitations. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (tout de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c."

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meuniers, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitations is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Partz, in Bern; Butlerov, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear.

Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might discredit an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

A MYSTERIOUS AFFAIR.

The narrative which follows appeared first in Felix Farley's Bristol Journal of October 10th, 1863, and was republished in the Spiritual Magazine of November of the same year, where the name of the "Dr. —" was given as Dr. James G. Davey of Norwood's Lunatic Asylum, near Bristol. Through the courtesy of a correspondent we are now able to add Dr. Davey's corroboration of the affair, together with an account of the subsequent course of events.

The narrative was as follows:—

We have often read of trials having taken place at the instance of ghosts, and it is just possible that one may again occur owing to the alleged revelations of an invisible spirit. The following are the facts which we have heard; we state them as we have had them from those who, we believe, had no wish to deceive, but we leave the reader to draw his own inference:—Dr. —*, residing in the neighbourhood of Bristol, had a son educated in his own profession, who received a medical appointment abroad. A few months ago the son resolved to return to England, and sailed by a British vessel bound for the port of London, undertaking to give his services as medical man in return for his passage. When, however, the ship was on its way home, the young surgeon, after a short illness, died; the captain of the vessel on reaching London communicated with Dr. —, and gave him an account of his son's death, handing him £22, which he said the latter had at the time of his demise; he also gave Dr. — what he stated to be a copy of the ship's log, in which all the circumstances were regularly given. Dr. — was so pleased with the captain's conduct that he made him a present of a gold pencil-case as a proof of his gratitude for kindness to his son. A few months after this Dr. —, who, from being quite a sceptic in Spiritualism and spirit-rapping, is now a believer in both, was with his wife at a séance of Spiritualists in London, when a great agitation amongst the furniture of the room and other symptoms of spiritual disturbance were noticed, upon which the medium, who is a lady, stated that the apartment was full of spirits, and that the unseen visitors were evidently desirous of making a communication to some one of the company. The medium was then asked to request that the spirit or spirits would give some indication of the person present with whom they wished to communicate. Upon this, a large table, without any apparent agency, was violently moved from the other side of the room, falling on its top close to Dr. —. The spirit was then required, according to the usual fashion, to state who it was, when it rapped out the name of Dr. —'s deceased son, who had died at sea, and who, to the terror of all present, intimated that he had died from poison. Dr. —, wishing to ascertain whether he was or was not deceived, asked the spirit for some evidence of its identity, upon which the unseen visitor intimated the nature of the present which Dr. — had given to the captain, and which he believed could have been known to no one present. Dr. — then asked if the poisoning was intentional, and the spirit rapped out that it might or might not have been; a discrepancy, of course, noticed by more than one present. The spirit, however, proceeded to say that he had left £70 when he died, whereas Dr. — only got £22; other particulars were entered into, and altogether, Dr. — was so impressed with the revelations that he paid a visit to the wife of the captain of the vessel, who had remained in London, and from whom it was elicited that her husband had stated to her that he feared Dr. —'s son was poisoned, and that, instead of getting some peppermint with some castor-oil when he was ill, he got prussic acid. A copy of the log was obtained from the owners of the ship, and Dr. — found it differed most materially from that handed to him by the captain of the vessel. There were other mysterious circumstances connected with the affair, which we are not at liberty to state, but altogether such strange secrets transpired, and there was something so unsatisfactory about the narrative given by the captain, when it came to be scrutinised, that Dr. —, we hear, has been induced to consult a criminal lawyer with a view to ulterior proceedings.

We give the circumstances without expressing any opinion of our own. We may, however, add that Dr. —, who resides in the neighbourhood of Bristol, is a man of the highest professional and personal respectability.

Dr. Davey, on being written to in October, 1884, wrote as follows:—

4, Redland-road, Bristol.

October 31st, 1884.

DEAR SIR,—It was, I think, in 1863 that I had a son of mine die at sea from poison, when on his passage home from the West Coast of Africa. The matter was, as supposed, duly reported to me by the captain of the ship, but within the year it happened I got to know something of Spiritualism (so-called) and at a séance in London, I learned (from my deceased son) that the report of his death, as it reached me from the captain, was untrue, that in fact his death was due to the steward of the ship, who gave him a quantity of the essence of bitter almonds, in some castor-oil, instead of peppermint, for which he (my son) had asked. Of the money part of the question, I never knew anything, but among my son's effects there were simply a few coppers, though there were good and valid reasons to suppose that he had some £70 in his possession, when he died. "Spiritualism" is a great fact; from 1863 to this time I have added much to my first knowledge of it, and since 1863 have had many interviews of a PERSONAL CHARACTER with my son.

The facts given by him in 1863 were all verified subsequently, to the evident sorrow and disgust of the captain, who, after a time, avoided me, and hurried himself to sea, lest, as I believe, he should be called to account for his false statements to the Secretary to the Board of Trade.—Faithfully yours,

J. G. DAVEY.

SLATE-WRITING MEDIUMSHIP.—Very many have been convinced of the truth of Spiritualism through the direct writing mediumship of E. C. Watkins. Like most mediums, he has not been financially compensated; but we are glad to learn by a letter from him, that he has been able to acquire a little farm in Northern Michigan. In his letter he says: "My spirit-guides, desirous of developing independent slate-writing mediumship more extensively, wish me to inform private and undeveloped mediums that if they send to me a lock of hair, or an article of clothing, they will inform them if they can become independent slate-writers." We invite responses to Mr. Watkins, Sylvester, Mecosta County, Michigan. We want a thousand mediums where we have one. From all parts appeals come to us for mediums, through whom some phase of the phenomena can be witnessed and something be learned experimentally of Spiritualism.—Spiritual Offering.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

At the ninth meeting of the present session of this Society, on the 24th June, Mr. C. C. Mussey read a paper entitled, "Individuality," in which an analysis of so-called "self-consciousness" was attempted, with a view to show that a true separate individuality had not the guarantee of consciousness, the "Ego," being an idea or representation, determined in relation to certain modes of thinking, willing, and feeling. This representation, like every other imagination, was a mental or thought object. It was, however, the central object, about which all the states of consciousness were grouped by association, thus maintaining conscious identity throughout the changes of these states. "The ideal representation, Ego, being once gained by association with a definite consciousness, has become a real power of maintaining this particular content as the character and will of the individual. It, this idea, is the central point to which the habitual modes of consciousness are attached. This imaginary self is all that consciousness ever informs us of as to our individuality. If, for instance, I am insane or in a dream, and imagine myself to be a king, or a wolf, you would say that is an illusion superinduced upon my true personality. Nevertheless, for myself, for my own consciousness, that personality is wholly merged and immersed in the imagination, and apart from the latter is for me a mere blank abstraction, with as little meaning or content as is Being ('with a big B'), for some of our philosophers. If you restore me to sanity or waken me, I revive to the belief in another self, associated with another mode of consciousness." It was admitted that this was only an answer to the alleged testimony of consciousness to the individuality. Nor could the proof be found, as was sometimes supposed, in the mere unity of the consciousness, since this, the indispensable condition of all consciousness, contained no principle of differentiation, but merely necessitated a representation of the "subject," which representation, in regard to difference or limitation, was entirely determined by the particular states, or contents, of the consciousness.

The paper proceeded to describe the important change from primary to reflective consciousness which all feeling must undergo in order to be raised from the objective to the subjective rank, and thus to determine the abstract representation, Ego. This reflection was a recognition, a literal re-cognition of the feelings, a mental acknowledgment and appropriation of them, whereby they were raised from their original objectivity in consciousness as mere sensation, and were thought as subjective. "The sensation is taken up into the thought by an act of attention, as when one says 'I am cold,' and soon finds the sensation unbearable by reason of this acknowledgment of it." "Some explicit characterisation in the nature of thought is probably necessary to determine a sensation as pleasurable or painful. We may perhaps derive some consolation in regard to our sympathy with animal suffering from the consideration that unthinking beings do not make an afflicted Ego out of their sensations. That animals feel pain at all is perhaps due to an elementary power of thought appropriation. There is no such specific sensation as pain or pleasure; only sensations which are pleasurable or painful, those qualities being added by attribution with reference to a self; that is, they are thought."

The application was then made to the dominant psychical feelings which collectively determine the Ego, the result being that the secondary mode of consciousness, reflection or thought, could be detected in the very process of constructing that imaginary entity, the represented self of individuality.

It was then pointed out that metaphysical denial of a true diversity of self was quite consistent with recognition of the historical existence of them as organic subjects of evolution and re-incarnation. The self of consciousness might be a fiction, but it was a fiction determined by real states of consciousness; and these might have, and probably had, a very transcendental history. The resemblance of the alleged laws of Karma re-incarnation to the reciprocal influences of heredity and environment was adverted to. The main thesis of the paper—that the individual Ego is a thought entity determined by reflective consciousness supervening upon the primary—was then applied in explanation of the Buddhist doctrine of destroying individuality by meditation. That was a great advance upon the old ascetic method, and even upon every religious principle which, while condemning the Ego, still recognises it as a fact, other, that is, than the creation of consciousness. A thoroughly consistent idealism cannot admit that; and it was the discovery of this idealism which separated the Buddha from his five ascetic companions, and led to the great meditation beneath the Bodhi-tree—an incident which might also be significant of the very interior process of which it was ostensibly only an external history. Thought can only resolve what thought has created, and the method of Buddhism is psychologically scientific. The root of Egoism was to be extirpated; that root being "attachment" to objects—to objective life. "A perfect intellectual conviction that a thing desired is undesirable makes it difficult for the desire to attain the ideal stage of imagination—re-cognition—without which it is ineffective. No merely ethical principle is comparable for efficacy to this flat contradiction of the reason to the implicit proposition of the desire. For the desire has to gain a certain assent by the mind to the immediate desirability of its object, an assent which, being a mere taking up into the mind of the suggestion of the desire, is quite consistent with moral disapprobation. Accordingly the Buddhist meditations go all directly to the point. Egoity is the summing up of all desires in the will to live, to be an ideal self-positing centre of desires. If we can once for all see this Ego as a fictitious subject of imagination without perplexing ourselves with the further metaphysical question, whose imagination, our insight will be experimentally justified, for the hallucination will melt away before the steadfast gaze which it cannot bear. The secret lies in two sentences; the object, the feeling, has, as desire, become subjective: make it object again. As mere object it expires. This objectification of the fictitious "subject" is a casting of it out and off. But out and off what?" The answer to this question, which had pertinaciously met them at every turn of the argument, must ultimately be sought in the old Vedantin principle of the one "self within the self"—the same in all. The difficulty in the way here—so far as concerned Buddhism—arose from the disposition of some of our leading authorities on the subject to detach Buddhism from the earlier philosophy of the Upanishads. There was the less warrant for this seeing that one of the latest injunctions of the Buddha himself to his disciples, as reported in the "Book of the Great Discourse," was that they should reject all future versions of his words which were not in accordance with the scriptures—the Vedas. Now they knew what generally was the conception to be found there. There was but one self, differentiating by successive and discrete acts of imagination, as in dream on our single plane of consciousness we often split ourselves up into diverse apparently distinct personalities. Thus to find "the self within the self" was to dispel the successive stages of Egoity and therewith the objective fiction. It was not annihilation, not loss of life, but an awakening to the fulness of all life, if only we excluded from the conception of life its active functions—a difficult condition truly. But short of this experience it was impossible to answer the question, What then is the subject to be delivered from the great "delusion of individuality"? "We are not, however, debarred from recognising an affirmative, as well as the negative side in the process itself of this deliverance. A pure subjectivity without content is unthinkable, and yet it is affirmed in the negation of every content which can constitute subjective character. Every negation of the Ego which becomes practical through being speculative is a declaration of freedom, and as such is the positing of an indeterminate self. That is just such a self as we are unable to think and to define; nevertheless in the act of positing, through negation of that which we can think and define, it becomes the greatest of realities. Nay, more, if all fictitious individuality is an ideal product (in the sense in which the ideal is not the real), the negation of this must be the recovery of a reality transcending thought. The refusal to define Nirvana or the positive substitute for individuality, is thus logically consistent with, and consequent on, the whole proposition of Buddhism, that the thought object has to do with impermanence and unreality."

The paper concluded: "To one who has entered into the spirit of Indian thought it is almost amusing to hear people oppose to its principle their profound sense and conviction of their own distinct personalities. For it is just in this very sense and conviction that personality consists; it is the self-consciousness. Deep, truly, is that dream, nor is its fabric baseless. But not to know that it is a dream is just that Avidya (Ignorance), from which there can be no awakening. But the dream has many stages, the Avidya many degrees. So let no one fear the loss of his individuality; for as long as he desires it, as long as he believes in it, he will not, for he cannot lose it. For it is that belief: it originates, and re-originates in that desire."

The above is an abstract of a considerably longer paper. In the course of the discussion which ensued, it was objected (by the President) that the distinction between individuality and personality—the mere "mask" of the individual—had not been sufficiently kept in view; and (by Mr. Roden Noel) that the reader of the paper had not succeeded in showing how objective differences could ever be derived from an unity which did not subjectively contain them. To the first objection it was replied that in the view presented, the distinction could be only one of degree; the individuality, relatively to the personality, would be a deeper and more permanent Ego, but would still be resolvable into the higher unity of the only self. The answer to Mr. Noel was that it was the separate egoistic representation of differences which was said to be finally resolvable; the differences themselves might metaphysically or eternally pre-exist, and be manifested ultimately as functions in an universal organism—but the separate self-consciousness of a function would be disease. The self-consciousness of them all would be the single cerebral one.

Observations on the paper were made by Mr. Percy Wyndham, Mr. Maitland, and others, and the proceedings terminated at the usual hour.

RECORDS OF PHENOMENA WANTED.

We shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

Mesmerism.	Haunted Houses.
Trance.	Communion with the Departed.
Clairvoyance.	Materialised Spirit Forms.
Thought-reading.	The Spirit Rap.
Previsional and Coincidental	The Spirit Voice.
Dreams.	Spirit Writing.
Apparitions.	Automatic Writing.
The Human "Double."	Movement of Material Objects
Presence at a Distance.	without Physical Contact.

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.

PROGRESS is a law of nature. Man is but a part of a universal system of things. He cannot get out of nature, nor out of the tides of universal life which are ever flowing from the Infinite Fountain of Being. All things grow up towards the light—the beautiful flower turns its head following the course of the life-bestowing sun; the tree grows with its top toward the sky; human nature tends in the ultimate ever Divine-ward.—S. J. FINNEY.

CURE BY SPIRIT POWER.—Undert his heading the Spiritual Offering publishes the following, with its legal verification. "In the cause of truth and in gratitude to our kind benefactor, we solemnly state the following facts. Our boy, Partner Gorman, had been suffering for three months with cerebro-spinal meningitis. He was attended by three good physicians, until they said nothing more could be done, and we daily expected he would be released by death. Business calling me to Potsdam, N.Y., my friend there, Stephen Grover, told me to go about my son to Dr. Loukes, for he had saved a boy suffering from the same disease. I went, and he would have visited him, but for the distance, twenty miles. Seeing my sadness, he said, 'Let us see what can be done, come with me.' He led me to two darkened rooms; told me to sit in one, while he shut himself into the other. In a short time he came to me, saying, 'We have treated your son; he is better; he will get well.' On returning home I found him sitting up in bed talking cheerily to his mother. He got better. When he was able to go out, he took a chill, through which he relapsed. I returned to Dr. Loukes, and he did as before. He is now well. No medicines were used. This is unexplainable by us as well as marvellous, only being equalled by Bible miracles of old.—Thomas Gorman. Witness, H. E. Irish." "On this 1st day May, 1885, before me came Thomas Gorman known to me to be the individual who executed the above, and acknowledged that he executed the same.—L. Robinson, Notary Public, South Colton, N.Y."

Astrology.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Even had I not to answer questions put expressly to me by your correspondent "Ebor," I would be the first to thank him for his valuable suggestion with a view to the collection of data, and the comparison of experience, in astrology. I may mention that an astrological society, of which I was a member, was formed some years ago, but was not sufficiently known, and soon ceased to exist. What is most wanted now, I think, is for a few persons who are students of the subject, and familiar with its rules and methods, to agree upon some principle of investigation, and engage in the collection of sufficient data for each head of inquiry undertaken. There could then be a division of labour with the object of arriving at a valid induction, should the results justify that, or of showing how far the elements of a true "science" really exist. I have long pursued a method of my own, which I believe offers the only means of scientific verification; and I have lately obtained satisfactory affirmative results, but I am stopped for want of data, which are required in an abundance not obtainable by any single individual without much greater energy and steady persistence than I possess. And I must add that negative results, or the very small constant margin of affirmative ones in excess of the arithmetical probabilities, have rather discouraged me. Still the margins are usually there, as far as I have gone, but the labour is great, and co-operation much required.

As to the "directions" referred to by "Ebor," I have studied, and believe in them—both the primary and the secondary—to some extent. But that any particular direction means a particular event, without regard to other very complex considerations in the horoscope, cannot be affirmed. The tendency, as fortunate or the reverse, is the most that can be predicted, except by a judgment of rare comprehension, acuteness, and experience. The rapt parallels are esteemed amongst the most powerful of the primary directions (the semi-arc method), and I believe I have found them to be so. But being formed upon the "angles" of the figure, they also require great exactitude in the time of birth, or the time of the event will be too divergent to enable us to prove the connection. And one weakness of the "science" is, that during the many centuries of its cultivation, eminent authorities have adopted different measures of time. That, however, was no doubt greatly due to the ambition to obtain a closer temporal coincidence between the direction and the event than the conditions admitted. As to the parallels named by "Ebor" signifying death, it is to be observed that astrologers do not predict death from any single direction, but require a "train" of evil directions, concurrent within two or three years. Certainly, I have known rapt parallels of one or other of the "infortunes" with the sun or moon fall within two or three months of the death, according to the usual measure of time adopted now—a year for a degree of arc. But I should not say the direction "caused" the death, or that the astrological connection was proved, without a more constant coincidence of the two things than can be truly alleged. I have always protested against the practice of writers on astrology giving a lot of affirmative cases without the least apparent perception of the elementary principle that selected instances prove nothing at all. If that were allowed it would be easy to demonstrate that thunder storms always happen on a Friday, or any other nonsense.

As to the secondary directions, I have also paid a good deal of attention to them, especially lately, and think them capable of verification. The school of astrology which may be described as the orthodox one, and which is at present represented by Mr. Alfred J. Pearce, the able author of the "Text Book of Astrology," "Science and the Stars," &c., considers them as operative only for a few weeks (as is probable), and by themselves of quite minor importance (which I doubt). On the other hand, "Raphael," who can quote eminent old authority for his view, consults them exclusively, and by a method of his own, which is ingenious and plausible, but on which I am not much disposed to rely. I suspect that modes of divination by astrology, giving true results, may often be confounded with directions; and that may have also led to many of the Arabian subtleties, now usually discarded. On the other hand, I have long been tending to the opinion that there is one and the same truth of nature underlying all the branches of astrology, including genethliacal and "horary" or divinatory. For instance, I do not think the "lordship" of the "houses" can have significance in horary astrology, yet none at all in horoscopes.

Before concluding this rather discursive letter, I should like to notice one fact which tends to show that astrology is really a science of observation, and not merely of tradition. That is the specific influence ascribed to Uranus. This planet having only been discovered within a little over a hundred years, it is remarkable that all astrologers are now agreed that directions to him denote events of a sudden and unexpected (usually sinister) character—catastrophes in general. I have myself observed striking instances of this, and have considerable belief in it. It will be highly interesting and important to ascertain what experience reveals about the astrological influence of Neptune. We have had about forty years of possible observation, and should begin to know something about him. I have somewhere read that the discovery of a new planet coincides with an epochal development of a character correspondent to that of the planet. The revolutionary era would thus have been denoted by Uranus; and it has been suggested that Neptune is associated with a new ideal era.

The Historic Jesus of Nazareth.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am grateful to Mr. Roden Noel for his testimony in favour of the doctrine of the "Personal Christ," in answer to the teaching of the leaders of the Hermetic Society, who would appear to desire to place themselves among "those false prophets who deny that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh."—1 John iv. 2.

That Agnostics, who deny the supernatural, should, because of the miraculous element in the history of Jesus, assert that the history is mythical, is easily understood; but that those should do so who believe in Modern Spiritualistic phenomena, in which may be found a replica of almost every miracle attributed to Jesus, is difficult to understand or to excuse.

That there may be a few discrepancies in the details of the Four Gospels may be admitted, although I assert that there is not one discrepancy of importance. But these few verbal discrepancies are to me a confirmation of the genuineness of the historic records: for had these been fabricated, the authors would have carefully compared the texts and rendered them exact in all details.

We all know how it has been "proved" that the first Napoleon never existed, because all his biographers not only differ in matters of detail but in essentials, one characterising him as an almost infallible demigod and another describing him as a vulgar charlatan, and yet I suppose there does not exist one living being who doubts that Napoleon was a real personage.

Again, take any event occurring in our day, and you will find all the morning papers which have not taken their narrative from the same reporter, vary not only in matters of detail, but often in essential matters, eliciting letters of protest from those concerned.

That the historic Jesus, as a bona fide, may have little influence on the souls of men, most thinking men will admit; and that the doctrine of the potentiality of the Christ in Man is the essence of Christian Theosophy, all Christian mystics will at once admit.

To deny, on the other hand, the historic Christ, is to assert that the Christ of God, the Divine Son or Word, has never fully possessed and transmuted any human being on this planet; and to assert, as the writer in to-day's "LIGHT" does, that successive re-incarnations are necessary to the regeneration as by water and the Spirit, is to assert that of which we have no scientific proof or historic confirmation in the history of the human race.

True, perhaps some men and women may, by self-biologising, believe that they remember their former incarnations, but there have existed since the days of Jesus about fifty thousand millions of human beings who never had any knowledge whatever of any such process.

Those who have passed into deep trance often say, "The reality and solidity of the spirit life infinitely transcends that of the flesh." And so it seems to me that Jesus the Christ was and is the most intense human personality, in all we know of the universe.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

"The Resurrection Body."

SIR,—In a letter signed "Lily," which appears in "LIGHT" for June 6th, a very theatrical performance described in very theatrical language is attributed to Liebig on the authority of Dr. N. B. Wolfe. It is stated that Liebig having invited his faithful students to the "temple of science," there and then proceeded to "dissolve by chemicals" a human body, to reduce its one hundred and forty-five pounds of matter to an "impalpable elementary condition," and to scatter the same upon the "viewless air."

Now it is said that Liebig occasionally perpetrated and published "tall" scientific jokes, and I am inclined to think it possible that Dr. N. B. Wolfe has got hold of the wrong end of one of these. Of course, anyone who chooses to exercise the requisite care and patience can dissolve a human or any other organised body into its ultimate elements. Granted that the decomposition of the matter composing a human body was to be demonstrated, no chemist, and least of all Liebig, would have set about it in the manner described, or with the quantity of material mentioned. Neither would he, nor any other "earthly" operator, have been enabled to spread the whole of the elements of that body in the gaseous form upon the "viewless air," as some of them are not amenable to that process, either in their free state or in their various combinations; neither did he reduce anything to an impalpable condition, because gases are perfectly palpable forms of matter as it is known to us. We are told that "the process was slow." No doubt it was—very. Since "chemicals" (a magical word) were used to attain the desired result, a considerable time must have been required, and the "viewless air" must have been rendered vastly unpleasant for the noses and the lungs of the "intensely interested" spectators.

In bringing such knowledge as we possess of matter and its laws to bear upon the investigation of the difficult and intricate phenomena of Spiritualism, it should be remembered that success in this direction can only be attained by those who have special knowledge, and that nothing will be gained, and much may be lost, if those who are not thus qualified make the attempt.

—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

June 23rd, 1885.

A SPIRITUALIST AND A CHEMIST.

Liebig's Experiment.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In reference to "A Spiritualist's" letter in your last issue, will you allow me to say that the result of my inquiries amongst men of practical science, is in exact opposition to "A Spiritualist," viz.: "that there is no doubt that Liebig's alleged successful experiment is a possible one," as I stated in general terms in my previous letter. Therefore as men of science, like doctors, disagree, we have only to wait for Dr. Wolfe's reference to that work of Liebig's from which he has taken the record of this experiment, and which having been related and published by him in such full detail, can hardly be the result of his own imagination.—I beg to remain, sir, faithfully yours,

June 27th.

XXXIV.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The gathering of facts is the beginning of all true science and philosophy. The appeal to the readers of "LIGHT" must, therefore, bring good results. An American periodical with the title of Facts is doing this work of collecting and recording the phenomenal basis of Spiritual Philosophy. American secular newspapers of the first class freely, and even eagerly, publish well-authenticated accounts of spiritual manifestations. Here we must for the present rely chiefly upon our own journals.

One curious "fact" respecting Spiritualism must not be lost sight of. It is that many of those who know are not very anxious that others should be in the same position. So far from wishing to gather and publish facts they are not only satisfied but a little tired of the phenomenal. "Why multiply facts? We have enough of them. Give us what they are meant to teach."

We must recognise also this mental condition. One fact may be as good as a thousand when we are sure of it.

Only, there are many millions of people, scattered over the earth, to all of whom these facts are of interest. We do not know why they have come to us at this time—we do not know that they will be continued. Here they are—here and now; and they should be carefully observed, carefully recorded, widely published for the benefit of present and future generations. We are told that spirit manifestations will become more and more common and perfect, so that the great fact of immortality will be one of daily observation—known of all men. On the other hand, many look upon Spiritualism, as it now exists, as a passing phase of life, the records of which may be of infinite value to future generations.

Consider how different it would be from what we call "Christianism" if the art of printing had existed twenty centuries ago, and newspapers had been published in Jerusalem. Consider how valuable our now recorded facts may be to those who live two thousand years hence. Only, the wonder will be that they were not printed in the Times, the Daily Telegraph, and all the daily, weekly, and monthly periodicals. And when our remote descendants read the testimony of scientists like Crookes, Wallace, or Zöllner, they will wonder why such facts were neglected by Darwin, Huxley, and Tyndall.

Our duty to the present and all future generations is clear and imperative. It is to carefully observe, record, and publish the facts of the spirit manifestations of our time. So we pay our debt for whatever the past has given us. So we make up for past neglects. But we can never sufficiently regret that there were no daily and weekly newspapers printed in Egypt, in the days of Moses. What trouble it might have saved that good Bishop Colenso, who for the want of such testimony was banished to the Zulus! In the meantime we must comfort ourselves with Moses and the Prophets in a revised translation.

I am obliged to the anonymous editor of The Occult Magazine for three numbers, 3 to 5, the previous ones being out of print—and therefore specially occult. It is a penny "monthly journal," published because "until the present time, advanced thinkers have had no European special organ for the elucidation of Mystical Philosophy; for the leading Spiritual papers are of necessity compelled to devote most of their space to matter pertaining to their own branch of Psychology."

I don't quite see it. A Spiritualist paper deals with spirit in all its manifestations—only when a thing is manifest it ceases to be occult. The evident object of Spiritualism is to reveal what is ordinarily hidden. The mission of "LIGHT" is to remove darkness. When we throw light upon Occultism it ceases to be occult.

And then, if "in Occultism the existence and immortality of man's spirit can be demonstrated like a problem of Euclid," what need can we have of phenomena, either of Occultism or Spiritualism? When a proposition is as clear as that two and two make four, or that the three angles of every triangle are equal to two right angles, where is the need of facts?

The occult—"hidden, invisible, secret, unknown, undiscovered, undetected" (Webster)—we certainly have little occasion for; and when anything is brought (or sent) to "LIGHT" it ceases to be occult. The moment a spirit manifests by materialisation, or in any way, he ceases to be occult. The very object of spirit manifestation is to destroy Occultism. It is the hidden (occult) things of darkness (Occultism) that are being revealed by Spiritualism in fulfilment of prophecy.

For all its occultness the Occult Magazine is quite worth reading. Some of its facts are very striking, and some are droll. I read, for example, that morning service at the Canterbury Cathedral sometimes begins with only the official staff, and ends with a congregation of two persons—while the salary of the non-resident Archbishop is £15,000 a year—the services, including prayers against the Mahdi, being occult enough for anything. The Japanese fashion of writing prayers and praises on wheels, moved by wind or water, is more economical, and may be more effective.

Here is another bit of pious Occultism—or thereabouts:

"A clergyman writes to the Church Times that he was the first to use incense in Protestant Episcopal worship, and promises to ring into Heaven any five virgins [wise or foolish?] who will give him the money to buy five chiming bells."

Here also is a good account of a debate in a theological seminary. After four hours' controversy there was a tie on the question: "Suppose a prayer on a formal occasion is read from a printed slip, and a typographical error completely ruins the proper sense, will Providence receive the petition as read, or as originally written?" Talk about Occultism, after that!

The Occult Magazine, which in spite of its occultness is still published, tells us that "the Adept's astral apparition, or double, is a fact, notwithstanding the pool-pools and sneers of the vain-glorious and conceited. Few, comparatively speaking, have the chance of seeing such a splendid sight, for the magnetic aura of humanity in general—with its steaming fumes of sensuality and spiritual atrophy—debars by magnetic repulsion the visible presence of the Master. Under very favourable conditions, however, they sometimes approach to individuals who are earnestly devoted to occult studies; but of course other living persons, apart from the Adepts, can project their double, so as to appear at a distance from their bodies. Peruse the works of Glanvil, Ennemoser, Crowe, Owen, Howitt, Des Mousseaux, &c., &c., and you will find many instances. At rare times the doubles talk, sometimes they wander whilst the subject's body is asleep, sometimes whilst awake, and very often the apparition is the forerunner of death."

Several yards of the columns of the Chicago Religio-Philosophical Journal are occupied with a review by William Emmett Coleman, of the exposure of Madame Blavatsky and the miracles of Theosophism in the letters of Madame Coulomb. The letters said to have been written by Madame Blavatsky, on which are based the accusations of fraud and various duplicities, are denounced by her as forgeries. The strongest point in her favour, with those who have not the advantage of her personal acquaintance, appears to be the testimony of her distinguished coadjutor, Colonel Olcott, to whose character and mediumistic work, especially the exercise of the gift of healing, we have the highest testimony.

There is no need of coming to hasty conclusions in these matters. In our criminal jurisprudence it is a maxim that every accused person is to be considered innocent until he is proven guilty—and even the verdicts of juries are sometimes wrong, and innocent persons are imprisoned or hanged. Perhaps the best we can do is to leave the wonderful Adepts of Thibet to the judgment of their peers, while we examine what is within our reach, the manifestations of spirit power in the presence of our own mediums on both sides of the Atlantic, with such testimony as we had last week from Mr. Meugens, of Calcutta, now making explorations in America. As a clear-headed man of business, he seems to us a thoroughly reliable witness.

The spirit of Mr. Coleman's article can hardly be called judicial. He says: "By the testimony of the Theosophists themselves, Madame Blavatsky is a wholesale liar. How then does proving Coulomb a liar clear Blavatsky? It is not the Coulombs' unsupported statements that convict Blavatsky; it is the damning evidence of her own letters; and so far I have not seen a particle of substantial evidence that they are not genuine. I shall try and get the committee's report and see if anything is adduced worthy of being called evidence, indicative of the Madame's innocence. If she is innocent, certainly a woman of her intellectual shrewdness ought to be able to produce some evidence of that fact; and if aught of that nature is adduced I shall take pleasure, as an act of justice, in presenting it to the readers of the Journal. As it now stands, however, I am forced to believe the letters genuine and their authors guilty of systematic fraud."

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND'S WORK IN ENGLAND.—The guides of Mrs. Richmond wish to announce that their medium will be at liberty to make engagements to speak in the provinces between July 12th and September 20th. The London series closes on 12th July, but will be resumed in September provided the committee receive sufficient support. INFERENCE AND PERSONAL OBSERVATION.

Apparently impossible, as are the phenomena of what is termed the materialisation of spirit-forms, and the production of independent writing in various languages within closed and fastened slates and books, to the uninitiated, they are, nevertheless, of almost daily occurrence; and recognising their genuineness as we do, we fail to see that they are a whit more marvellous and inexplicable than are the supposed facts, and inferences deduced from many of the facts, which occupy the attention of scientists.

Scientists, in view of well-observed cosmical phenomena, generally believe that the sun, earth, and all stars, planets, and nebulae, were, at some period in the immeasurable past, rotating masses of highly-heated gaseous matter; that by a process of cooling and consequent consolidation, those masses assumed a more or less solid spheroidal form; that after having rotated millions, or it may be billions of years, rings, and finally spheres were thrown off, which in their present stage of consolidation form suns, planets, and moons, such as probably belong to the millions of star systems now visible, or as yet invisible to man in the infinitude of space.

Scientists further believe that under certain physical combinations and conditions of matter, life was evolved, at first in a low and feeble form; that by development and evolution differentiation gradually increased, and that now all forms of animal and vegetable life on the surface of this and unnumbered millions of other worlds, are the offspring of primal protozoal organisms, which by a process at present inexplicable, made their appearance on every developed world, and that from what may be termed inanimate matter, there sprang simple organic vital forms, which, after passing through protozoa, calcuterata, articulates, mollusca, fish, amphibia, reptilia, bird, marsupial, and quadrupedal mammalia, at last culminated in the flower of organic creation, Man—man in a low, rude, savage and unintellectual state at first, but finally man who in the long process of the ages has culminated in the philosophers, poets and metaphysicians of the historical era.

All these opinions are inferences deduced from observations on solar and planetary motions, resting on Laplace's Nebular hypothesis; and from biological and palaeontological researches based on the order of the introduction of vegetable and animal life, founded on the testimony of the rocks; and from the embryonic and other researches of biologists, in reference to the primal development of man and other animals. This is, however, little more than inference, as in no single instance in the records of the past, or in the experience of the present, has the evolutionary transition been observed. Slight modifications in form and colour have been observed, such as we see daily in the human family; but any change such as the advance of a fish to an amphibian, an amphibian to a true reptile, a reptile to a bird, never!—although in paleontology, the apparently connecting links between fish and reptile, reptile and bird, are often disentombed. The real transition, however, has not yet been observed, and has not been historically recorded.

The doctrine of evolution, therefore, is a doctrine founded on inferences, based upon the relations of observed facts, extending through countless millenniums of time, and is never in a single instance the result of the observational experience of a single man.

Do we deny, then, inferences? Not by any means. We rather accept them as legitimate inductions from the consideration of ancient and modern facts.

Inferences from an extensive, and, as is freely acknowledged, a very incomplete body of facts, are justifiable, if the facts as far as they are known point in one direction. But inferences from observed and frequently repeated phenomena, that can at almost any time be reproduced, and may now be observed by any man of a judicial and critical mind, are far more valuable as a basis for theory than inferences from facts indiscriminately scattered over the face of the earth, which require the longest life and most devoted industry to examine a limited number of them. A scientific man is bound, therefore, to establish his theories on his own relatively limited observations, and on the testimonies of others whose powers of observation and truthfulness are only problematical.

If the scientific world can accept evolution as a theory to explain the life-history of the universe—a theory which contains many millions of more unbelievable marvels than the materialisation of visible human forms out of invisible matter, or the writing within closed slates or books, which may be observed by any rational man—why should the leaders of science not examine the alleged facts of Modern Spiritualism, and from observations rather than from mere prejudices and preconceptions deduce their inferences? If such a course were followed the result is not difficult to be foreseen by those who are familiar with the facts.

THE Earl of Dunraven, a Spiritualist of many years' standing, has been appointed Parliamentary Under Secretary for the Colonies in the new Ministry.

WE regret to learn that M. Tissot has been very ill since his return to Paris, but we are happy to announce his complete restoration to his usual health.

"A NEW BASIS OF BELIEF IN IMMORTALITY," by Mr. John S. Farmer, has been translated into, and will shortly be published in, the German language. The translator is Count Schonfeldt, a half-brother of the Prince Liechtenstein.

It is no secret, we believe, that several members of the new Cabinet, in addition to others in the Government, are favourably disposed to Spiritualism. Surely it ought not to be a difficult matter, with so much influence, to get the obnoxious Witchcraft Act repealed.

A SPIRITUALIST and journalist of many years' standing, desires to engage in literary work of any kind. Manuscripts prepared for and put through the Press. Dawson Rogers, of National Press Agency, and many others.—Address, A.B., care of the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W.

SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.—A general meeting of this Society will be held on Friday, July 10th, at the rooms of the Society of British Artists, Suffolk-street, Pall Mall, London, S.W. The chair will be taken at 8.30 p.m. The meeting, which will be partly of a conversational character, is open to members and associates, who are at liberty to invite friends. Members and associates will be admitted on writing their names at the door. Persons who do not belong to the Society will be admitted on the production of an invitation-card, duly filled in with one or more names, and signed by a member or associate. Edward T. LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

On Thursday evening, June 26th, a Conversazione of the Alliance was held at the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall. There was a large and influential gathering of Spiritualists and friends to welcome the President, Mr. W. Stainton Moses, after his long and severe illness, and to listen to an address from Mr. Thomas Shorter entitled, "Modern Spiritualism: the Progressive Development of its Phenomena." Mr. Stainton Moses opened the meeting by the following address:—

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN,

My first duty, and a pleasant one it is, is to express my great thankfulness at being permitted once again to meet my friends here, and to thank them once more for all the kindness they have shown me. If I do not find myself—as alas! I do not—up to the old standard of work, I feel that I can rely on a kindly consideration which has never failed me, and I can honestly promise that no effort of mine that can fairly be made shall be lacking for the furtherance of the end that we all desire—the advancement of an intelligent appreciation of that complex and intricate subject that we call Spiritualism. It has not always been fortunate in its methods of presentation; there is room for improvement there. But it deals with matters that are in their essential nature of absorbing interest, and it touches all that is most momentous to man as an immortal being.

You will expect from me some account of what this Society is doing. We "have done what we could": and I have the highest authority for believing that that record is one to be commended. You are the arbiters; you entrust us with certain powers; we use them as far they will go, to the best of our ability, and at our wisest discretion. That is all that we can do; for, by solemn pledge given at our birth, we may not get into debt, nor do work that is ready to our hands when the material means are not forthcoming.

We have taken a home for ourselves at 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, a very central position, as likely, we think, to be useful to our members as any that we could hit upon. We have placed in a cosy and convenient room the library which, by the grace of the late Central Association of Spiritualists, is now at our disposal. It is at the full service of our members, and it is supplemented by a number of Spiritualist journals of this and other countries, which should be of interest, and which will keep us, at any rate, if we read them, from becoming insular and groovy, and will lead us to a breadth and generosity of interest in our fellows which is much to be desired.

To make this reading-room and library thoroughly useful, and to place its resources fully at the disposal of our members, we need an efficient secretary. We have no such officer; and we cannot at present afford one. It is for you to enable the Council to supply this grave defect, and so to place the resources of the Society unreservedly at the disposal of all our members throughout each day. This we cannot do with the funds which we at present administer. The value of the library and of the reading-room would be so much enhanced by the presence in the room of an intelligent person who could receive visitors, distribute books, and answer inquiries, that I can hardly imagine that the Society will not feel itself impelled to provide such a necessary functionary.

For the rest, the various spheres of usefulness that lie open before us are necessarily left to be tended by private effort, because we have not the means of attacking them. No one who has not been inside the movement—who has not received, as I have done, scores, hundreds, thousands of letters begging for guidance, help, enlightenment—can form any idea of the great craving that there is for spiritual food. The children crying for the bread of life! The cry is ever ringing in my ears! Men and brethren, my friends who have this great truth in your possession, how long is it to go up in vain? I do not for a moment lose sight of the efforts that are being made outside of our own borders to meet this growing want. I am thankful for all agencies for the dissemination of knowledge. But none the less I feel that all combined are miserably inadequate to do the pressing work that ought to be done. There should be no small jealousies in this matter. I, for one, am thankful for any help in doing what seems to me to be a plain duty, and I shall be proud to co-operate with any man who will lend a helpful hand in doing any part of the work that God, in granting us this blessed experience and knowledge, has laid upon every one of us. Stewards we are, one and all of us, entrusted with a great truth; stewards for the mighty Master, labouring for the great account. There is no room for small jealousies in such a work. We shall meet our account the better in proportion as we discharge our plain responsibilities.

The presence of Mr. Shorter on the platform to-night accentuates what I am saying. We are a society of old Spiritualists, of persons who know what they believe, and who, in virtue of that belief, have plain duties to discharge. The name of Thomas Shorter carries me back to an age with which some of us here present are, perhaps, unfamiliar; to an age that is already historic. When he was working with the cautious care, the thoroughness, and the indefatigable industry which characterised him, he was associated with many great names. "There were giants on the earth in those days." I do not presume to present any historic record. This is not the time nor the place to appraise individual effort, where all laboured for a common cause. But some names rise at once to my lips. There was William Wilkinson, who did so much for the literature of the movement, and with whom Mr. Shorter was so closely associated in the conduct of the Spiritual Magazine. There were Mr. and Mrs. Newton Crosland, honoured members of our own Society. There was the venerated name of Mrs. Howitt Watts, now, to our enduring sorrow, removed from our midst, though, as I have good cause to know, not less active in promoting the work that she loved and adorned by her labours. There was her husband, Mr. Alarie Watts, with whom I am proud to stand here to-night. There was William Howitt, whose doughty deeds in defence of our faith are matter of common knowledge, and of universal acknowledgment. There was another of our members, General Drayson, whose scientific acquirements and unvarying readiness in defence of our faith did us, and still does us, such invaluable service. And, not to make the list unnecessarily long, there was Benjamin Coleman, whose shrewd common-sense and firm convictions enabled him to lay Spiritualists under a very deep debt of gratitude for many a battle worthily won. Nor must I omit a reference to two honoured names, long and worthily associated with Spiritualism—Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall. These and many more—for my list in no way pretends to exhaustiveness, nor have I time to enumerate all those honoured names whose praise is familiar in our mouths—these are some of the stars that illuminated the world in this now bygone age.

I have always felt that we are greatly indebted to these early pioneers. They accumulated rich stores of fact which they have handed on to us, a deposit which we hold in trust for the generation that shall in its turn succeed us. They have given to us a coherent system of philosophical exposition, which, if it does not explain all mysteries, does at any rate give a reasonable explanation of the origin, cause, and purpose of these manifestations of the power of spirits. The explanation of the Spiritualist—the Spiritualist hypothesis, we will call it, if you please—has, in my judgment, never been successfully impugned by any efforts of the many divergent schools of thought that have busied themselves with these problems. For myself—unless I must make two exceptions, which in very truth prove the rule, and which are in character and intention, quite exceptional—neither in my own now large experience, nor in what I know of that of other investigators, have I ever known a single case in which a spirit manifesting in any way whatever, at a circle, or to a medium, in public, or in private, ever claimed or pretended to be anything else but the spirit of a departed human being. I think I may have heard some claims to a particular name made by a spirit, which claims seemed to me hardly made out. I have even heard some that are preposterously absurd: Shaksperes desperately illiterate; Miltons both "mute and inglorious." But of the essentially human character of the manifesting intelligence I entertain no sort of doubt. They make good their claim, these manifesting spirits, to be of our brethren, sharers with us in the experiences of earth-life, moulded by its discipline, scarred by its sins and sorrows, constituted as they are by virtue of its myriad and manifold experiences. I am not sure that I can frame any adequate idea of what the deportment of an elemental spirit, or of a spirit which was in fact the astral soul of the medium, ought to be. Nor am I much concerned to speculate. When I find a spirit putting forward any such claim I will study its deportment with all due care. In the meantime, these beings, so far as I have made myself acquainted with them—and I have had many opportunities of so doing—are thoroughly and essentially human. They could not play the part they do if they were anything else. Their knowledge of us and of our humanity, their characteristic foibles, the information they give, the very blunders that they make sufficiently demonstrate that they are of our stock, men and women with like passions to ourselves. This, I need hardly remind you, is a very strong point in our argument: and it has never, I repeat, been successfully combated since those early days of Spiritualism to which Mr. Shorter's presence carries us back.

This, then, is part of our inheritance from those early days—facts and their explanation. But this does not represent our total debt. These gentlemen whom I have named, and others who stood forth with them, have left to us a brilliant example of manly and simple courage, manifested at a time of no ordinary difficulty. At a time when it needed a brave man to avow a belief that might imperil his reputation, his prosperity, nay, his very sanity in the opinion of his fellows, these men stood forward as the champions of an unpopular cause, and the apostles of unwelcome truth. All honour to them for what they did. They made it possible for their successors to carry on the work which was bequeathed to them. And they have left to this Laodicean age—an age enervated by its prevailing faithlessness, by its corroding Materialism, and its halting, lame Agnosticism,—an example which it sorely needs. This is, unless I greatly mistake, an age across the face of which are written certain dominant notes or characteristics; an instability of purpose which paralyses heroic effort; a listless indifference which strikes at the root of sustained endeavour; and a calculating selfishness which leads a man to attach what in mercantile circles would be called a wholly fancy value to his own comfort and reputation for “safety.” We Spiritualists partake of the spirit of the age. We need stiffening; we want our purposes made more firm. And nothing will do for us what we want so completely as the cultivation of a spirit of simple and sincere self-sacrifice. We may learn somewhat of that lesson from the men of whom Mr. Shorter is to-night representative. I beg, with these introductory remarks, to call upon him to deliver his address.

Mr. SHORTER said:—

My acquaintance with Spiritualism dates from the time of its introduction into this country more than thirty years ago, and by my association with its literature during a large portion of the time, as well as by personal investigation, I have kept myself fairly conversant with its many phases up to the present time. I shall to-night speak wholly of those phenomena which are familiar to us and to which I can personally testify. My object in doing so will be, not to present a history, nor to exhibit the evidence for their occurrence, nor to give an exposition of the philosophy of the subject, but simply to show that these phenomena, in the order in which they have been presented, are not the result of accident; that they did not occur fortuitously; that they are not without a purpose or aim; but that there is a method in their development—a law of evolution to be observed in connection with them no less apparent than that seen in connection with other natural phenomena; in short, that their development has been orderly and progressive.

At the time of which I have spoken, when the subject was first introduced to my notice, Spiritualism was known amongst us only as spirit-rapping and table-moving. These terms were fairly descriptive of it as it was then known, and it is very significant that no adequate account of these phenomena has ever been given to the world. They were then, and still are—though a generation has elapsed—inexplicable to modern science. I need hardly remind you that according to the elements of acoustics sound can only be produced by the impact of one body on another. So long as a body produces no vibration there is no sound. In these rappings we have detonations varying in force and intensity from a faint tick to a blow like that produced with a sledge hammer, and yet of the two factors which science declares to be indispensable to the production of sound only one was present.

So with regard to table moving. It is asserted that no movement can take place except through some form of mechanical force. Yet here heavy bodies were moved without the application of any motor force. It is true that a very eminent professor endeavoured, as he thought, to deal a fatal blow at what began to be called “the new superstition,” by the invention of an ingenious instrument to show that such movements were produced by the unconscious muscular pressure of the sitters. That might apply in those cases where lateral pressure was exerted, but it could have no application in others where an upward movement was observed in opposition to a downward pressure, or where no contact took place. We were told that under these latter conditions the thing could not possibly happen—that it was impossible according to all known laws of nature. The obvious rejoinder was that, spite of talk about known laws of nature, the phenomenon actually occurred, and it was only rendered more necessary to find a different solution.

Still it might fairly have been contended that if the phenomena were limited to sounds and movements—if there were no intelligence behind them—though they might present an interesting problem or furnish suggestions of a new force which science had not recognised, there would still be nothing in them to make it necessary to seek their explanation beyond the lines of physical causation. When, however, it was found that these phenomena showed obvious signs of intelligence; that they possessed a power of adaptation; that they varied in force at suggestion; that they could respond to questions and give answers; and that these sounds and movements were simply used as a new code of signals; that they could select and arrange letters of the alphabet so as to form words and sentences, and answers to questions relevant to the matter in hand—then it became evident that there was some other force at work than a blind unintelligent power. There were abundant evidences of an agency closely associated with intelligence, and as a stream cannot rise higher than its fountain, so it is evident that no intelligent phenomena can be the production of an unintelligent force; and when it was found that this intelligence uniformly, persistently, and everywhere, affirmed itself to be the agency of departed human beings, of those who had once lived on earth—and very generally the friends of those present—then the whole question at issue between Spiritualism and Sadduceism was raised. It became evident that if the phenomena went no further, here was the manifestation of a power—a new basis of belief, clear, palpable, and capable of verification—popular in its inception, appealing to the great body of men, and, therefore, deserving of the highest consideration.

It was soon manifest that if a new mode of intercourse with the spirit-world had been opened up, that if this intercourse were to be profitably extended, this method was ponderously difficult, and that some more easy mode of intercourse must be provided. The demand was promptly met. It was found that the hands of sensitive persons could be controlled to write automatically, at first with difficulty, but with increasing facility as they became more exercised in this direction. In this way not only answers to questions, but long messages and elaborate treatises, were communicated to the world.

Not only the human hand, but the whole organism, was subject to this control. Some were used for personation, representing by characteristic action, gesture, and deportment, the spirit who desired to be recognised by those present. More frequently still, the vocal organs only would be used, and in this way many messages of sympathy and affection were given to inquiring friends and relatives; and as this control became more perfect, public addresses were delivered, and in some instances poems were improvised on subjects suggested by the audience. To follow up this would lead me into digression, for the trunk line of manifestation here branches out into two directions, and with that which is purely psychical I have here no immediate concern. In these phenomena, as in nature, we have a dual and progressive development, as in the great kingdoms of nature, from the mineral to the vegetable, from the vegetable to the animal and human. And as within each kingdom there is a corresponding interior development from granite to diamond in the mineral kingdom, from moss and lichen to flower and tree in the vegetable kingdom, and in the animal kingdom from zoophyte to mammal, from lowest savage to the highest type of civilised man, so we find a corresponding dual development in the phenomena of which I am speaking. The phenomena grade from the spirit-rap to psychography, and from table movements to form manifestation, and we find in each a corresponding interior development. For instance, the movement of the table was simply the manifestation of the power of spirit to control physical substances. This by natural evolution involved the power of transporting material objects from place to place, and to increasing distances. It also involved the power of spirits to cause what is called matter to pass through matter, or solids through solids, as, for instance, the passage of flowers, fruits, shrubs, snow and ice, and even living organisms, into lighted and warm rooms of which the doors and windows were closed, and all ordinary means by which such things could be imported carefully guarded. So it was with other phenomena. In the case of the visible presentation of the materialised spirit we have first the spirit hand; then after a time the hand and arm were exhibited. Then spirit faces began to be seen; these at first were vague and indefinite in outline; they gradually, however, became more distinct and individualised. The head and bust were then shown, and lastly the full form, frequently bearing the impress of some departed friend or relative. In all this you will perceive a progressive development. It has followed the natural order, from simple to complex—from lower to higher—from physical to psychical. In all these phenomena there has been a mutual corroboration and confirmation of the claims put forward of spiritual agency from the first—each confirming and supporting the other. Thus the original assertion that departed human spirits were concerned in their production was confirmed by psychography in characteristic handwriting, and appended autograph; in the clairvoyant perception of the spirit who claimed to be present; in the personation and dramatic representation; in the spirit photograph, and in the form manifestation, which exhibited clear characteristics of individual humanity.

It has been urged that these phenomena were low and unspiritual, and materialistic in their tendency and character. It may be that this is not altogether without foundation if we confine our attention to the purely physical side of the phenomena without regard to their spiritual significance. But it is deserving of note that contemporaneously with the manifestation of spirit power there have been other and larger movements which we are too apt to disregard. Contemporaneously with Modern Spiritualism, or slightly overlapping it, we find a remarkable series of illustrations of spiritual activity manifesting itself throughout the churches. Whilst the phenomena of Spiritualism are eminently adapted to meet a sceptical and agnostic age, satisfied with nothing short of sensuous demonstration of spiritual existence, yet there has always been, and probably always will continue to be, a large class of minds who in all things spiritual are conservative in their habits and associations, who cling to the faiths they have inherited and in which they have been trained, and to whom these phenomena would present no attraction; who would regard all manifestations from the spiritual world which did not come through traditional channels in methods according to prescription and precedent, as disorderly. If this order of minds were to be reached it would have to be through other means, formal, cold, and ceremonial, as the Churches had become; they required by any means to be aroused from that lethargy so fatal to the higher faculties of the soul. Thus the spirit world, in its universality and through its abundant resources, found the best methods of meeting this class of minds, and I should be presenting but a narrow and partial view of a great subject if I did not briefly glance at the manifestations which have taken place outside Spiritualism in order to meet the needs of the great body of people who could not be affected by such phenomena as we have been considering.

Take, for instance, the outpouring of spiritual gifts associated with the name of Edward Irving, the speaking with tongues, the discerning of spirits, and the gifts of healing. Simultaneously with this there was another movement very different in kind, affording in most respects a contrast, yet similar in its spiritual working. I refer to the strange revival of ancient Judaism on the Western Continent in the Church of the Latter Day Saints. With all its follies there was in it abundant evidence of an outpouring of spirit power.

I might also refer to the wave of religious revival which spread over this country a few years ago, and in connection with which occurrences took place strangely like the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism; and still more recently we have had what is known and what Spiritualists recognise as spiritual healing, called in the Bethshans the faith cure. Only within the last few weeks we have had a conference in London, attended by delegates from many countries on the Continent and from the United States of America, at which abundant testimony to remarkable cases effected by faith and prayer was given.

I refer to these examples in order to take a larger and more comprehensive view of the phenomena of Spiritualism by collating and comparing them with other phenomena which preceded and appeared contemporaneously, and to show that there is a parallel between the movement called Spiritualism and what is taking place in the Churches and in the world. It confutes that sophism to which David Hume gave currency, that the psychical phenomena of our time and the miracles of a former time are incredible because contrary to all human experience. They are certainly not contrary to all human experience, for the spirit-world has never left itself without a witness. It has left its mark on all history and literature; it has sealed its impress on every age and nation. Throughout the world, wherever human hearts have beat, wherever men have hoped and suffered and experienced the loss of those who were dear to them, there has been the sense of a mystery which swathes us round—the consciousness of a spirit-world impinging on our own, and enveloping us in its atmosphere. We may be, some of us are, insensible to these higher harmonies from the invisible world; yet it is also true that there are here amongst us those of more ethereal mould less closely pent within the body's prison, who have made excursions from this into that realm which is to be their future home, who have had glimpses of the glories of that supernal world, who have heard faintly and afar off the echoes of that choir invisible in whose music is the gladness of the world; who have sought eagerly for some response to that cry which has welled from every human heart wherever lover and friend and child have one by one disappeared into the realms beyond; who have sighed in the agony of their heart's bereavement for and who have listened not altogether in vain to the murmurs of that mighty ocean whose waves ever beat on the shores of our immortal life.

“The touch of a vanished hand

And the sound of a voice that is still,”

“And through their deep rolling,

Have heard their sweet calling

Of spirits that sing in a soft under tongue

The sense of the mystical march;

And have cried to them softly,

“Come nearer! come nearer;

And lift up the lap of this dark, and speak clearer,

And teach us the song which he sung.”

Mr. W. Stainton Moses then said it was his duty and a great pleasure to move to Mr. Shorter a cordial vote of thanks for his most admirable address. He had found himself wondering, as he listened to the closely reasoned words of Mr. Shorter, how it was his voice was heard so seldom, and why, if they could not always have the privilege of listening to his voice, they might not be instructed by his large sagacity and experience, through the medium of the Spiritual Press. He wished Mr. Shorter might find it within his heart to let them hear of him more often in the future. He further wished to rectify an omission he had made in mentioning the early pioneers of the movement, although he did not pretend for a moment to mention them all. He had strangely omitted to mention the name of a lady who was a member of the Alliance and to whom all owed a very deep debt of gratitude. There was no book in the literature of the movement more able in its defence of Spiritualism than that which is entitled “From Matter to Spirit.” And in mentioning Mrs. de Morgan he included her husband, Professor de Morgan, from whose pen came the preface to that volume; both stood in the most honoured places. He had also to announce that this meeting closed the present session, and an adjournment would take place to October, when he hoped they would be able to re-open these rooms. He trusted to be able to open the session himself by a paper. Until that time the Council hoped to meet their friends at the chambers in Craven-street.

Mr. Shorter, in replying to the vote of thanks, referred to a point which had escaped him when speaking—the remarkable parallel which existed between the visible presentation of the materialised spirit form and the spirit photograph. Everyone who had collected any number of these photographs would see that there was a very close correspondence between them and the phenomena of materialisation. There were in both the same vague and cloudy appearances preceding the presentation of a separate form—the same indistinctness at first in the mask-like faces presented in the earlier phases, the same luminous drapery—in fact, the same gradual development throughout.

The meeting then resolved itself into an informal gathering, separating at about 11 p.m.

The musical programme, arranged by the Misses Withall, was ably sustained by those ladies, assisted by Madame Amey, Miss Wade, Mr. Tietkens, and Mr. G. S. Darter. A grand piano was again kindly lent for the occasion by Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons.

HUMAN MAGNETISM.—Signor Damiani communicates to the Medium and Daybreak the fact of a gentleman, by magnetic passes in a dark corner of a room, changing the yellow colour of a tulip to white. The flower was handed to him by the lady of the house, who said that it was the third time of the occurrence of such a phenomenon in her presence.

A MATERIALISING MEDIUM OF THE OLDEN TIME.

By "M.A." (Oxon).

My attention has been drawn to an old book, published in 1807, and entitled, "The Eccentric Mirror: reflecting a faithful and interesting delineation of male and female characters ancient and modern, who have been particularly distinguished by extraordinary qualifications, talents, and propensities natural or acquired, comprising singular instances of longevity, conformation, bulk, stature, powers of mind and body, wonderful exploits, adventures, habits, propensities, enterprising pursuits, &c., &c., &c., with a faithful narration of every instance of singularity manifested in the lives and conduct of characters who have rendered themselves eminently conspicuous by their eccentricities: the whole exhibiting an interesting and wonderful display of human action in the grand theatre of the world. By G. H. Wilson." (London: Printed for James Cundee, Ivy-lane, Paternoster-row.)

It must be confessed that Mr. Wilson makes the most of his title-page. In his book he gives us the story of "Thomas Topham, the strong man," with a diverting picture showing the modern Hercules in the act of tying a poker round his neck: "The lady of the haystack," a half-witted girl who seems to have preferred a haystack to a house for her residence: a biography of Mr. William Evans, "a sort of epicure in wigs and walking-sticks": a notice, naturally, of Valentine Greatrakes and his wonderful cures: and finally an account of one Schröpfer. This individual seems to have started life as a waiter in a Leipzig coffee-house. He disappeared suddenly, and some years afterwards reappeared as the Baron Schröpfer, "to whom all nature, and even the world of spirits, were subject." "He showed people the spirits and shadows of their deceased acquaintances. . . . 'Come and see!' he cried to all who were inclined to doubt: they came, and actually saw shadows, and various terrible sights, which made the hair of timorous persons stand erect."

Schröpfer "performed his miracles at home, in private apartments prepared for the purpose." This is the sort of entertainment that was provided on one occasion. The observers "were all conducted into a large hall, hung with black cloth, the window-shutters of which were closed." Round the spectators Schröpfer drew a circle, out of which they were on no account to stir. "At the distance of a few paces a small altar was erected, on which the flame of burning spirits gave the only light that illumined the room." Schröpfer, with a drawn sword, which he flourished over his head, prostrated himself before the altar in an ecstasy of apparent prayer. "He was to call the shade of a well-known character lately deceased." He apostrophised the ghost: "Oh, thou departed spirit, who livest in an immaterial world, and invisible to the eye of mortals, hear the voice of the friends thou hast left behind, and who desire to see thee; leave for a short time thy new abode, and present thyself to their eyes." "Hereupon the spectators felt in every nerve a sensation similar to an electric shock; they heard a noise like the rolling of thunder, and saw above the altar a light vapour, which grew thicker by degrees, till it assumed the figure of a man. . . . The phantom hovered over the altar, and Schröpfer, pale as death, flourished the sword over his head. . . . The spectre at length disappeared, and Schröpfer was so exhausted that he lay extended on the floor." Why, if this were all a mere imposture (as the writer would seem to wish us to believe) Schröpfer should lie in this trance-like state we are not told. If what was seen was a shadowy materialisation, his exhaustion and entrancement would be natural.

Schröpfer at last got into debt, and resolved his difficulties by suicide. Who he was—Jesuit agent as he was, of course, dubbed by some, or a man possessed of occult psychical powers—we are not able to determine from Mr. Wilson's narrative. To him he is just one in a gallery of curiosities, like the man with the poker, or the lady with her haystack. But there is that in the narrative which is so craievable that I suspect the man of being a medium.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.—The address announced in our last issue was delivered on Sunday evening at the Kensington Town Hall. Impromptu answers were first given to a number of questions sent up to the chairman, and read out by him. The address was then given in a most able manner, and was listened to with great interest. In such condition, or nearly so, as we leave this world when death summons us, shall we enter spirit-life. We shall be little changed in our thoughts or aspirations. Still it will be a state of improvement. We shall be set free from many of the trammels of earthly life and circumstance, and shall be released from the influence of its passions. As various as are the conditions of those who enter spirit-life so will be the conditions found in spirit-life. In this life we are enshrouded in a physical body; in spirit-life we shall be surrounded by higher influences, guiding and watching over us, teaching us to rise and improve. Spiritualism is the avant courier of the new religion. The teachings of former religions have been scant as to immortality. Spiritualism demonstrates it specially. It is the alphabet of the new religion. It teaches us that we can communicate with those that have passed away. It teaches us that loving ones, though unseen, direct and guide us and seek to save us from despair when cast down. It affords new avenues of communication between this world and the life to come. Like as when it is intended to open up a new country and construct a railroad, there are first the pioneers and explorers, then the labourers to prepare the way along which the line is laid, and lastly the engine and the train when all is complete, so does Spiritualism prepare the way for the new religion. As in spirit life we are watched over by guardian angels, so again are angels instructed and counselled by archangels; and archangels again by still higher and greater intelligences. The subject chosen for the impromptu poem was "The Solar System." It was announced that the subject for next Sunday evening would be "Angels and Archangels: their Power over Man's Spiritual States and Destiny." The series will close on July 12th, to allow of a visit to the provinces, but they will be resumed on September 20th, if the committee receive sufficient support in aid of the funds from those interested in the movement. Anyone desirous of aiding the committee is desired to communicate with Mrs. Strawbridge, No. 11, Blandford-square, N.W.

CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM ASSOCIATION OF INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM. (81, Wells-street, Camberwell, S.E.)—Miss Keever has kindly consented to deliver an address on Sunday evening next at seven o'clock. Other mediums have promised to attend on future occasions, notice of which will be given in due course. The Thursday evening circle is now closed, and another circle for Tuesdays at eight o'clock is in course of formation. Friends wishing to join are requested to attend or communicate with the secretary.

DE QUINCEY'S LAST MOMENTS.—"He had been in a doze for some hours, and as it had been observed that in his waking hours since the beginning of his illness he had reverted much to the incidents of his childhood and talked especially of his father, regretting that he had known so little of him, so in this final doze his mind seemed to be wandering among the same old memories. 'My dear mother, then I was greatly mistaken,' he was heard to murmur, and his very last act was to throw up his arms and utter, as if with a cry of surprised recognition, 'Sister, sister, sister!' The vision seemed to be that of his sister Elizabeth, dead near Manchester, twenty years before, and now waiting for him on the banks of the river."—From Life of De Quincey, by David Musson, p. 133, in Series of "English Men of Letters."

CANINE INTELLIGENCE.—Captain P. M., of Paimpol, and Captain M., of Granville, were old friends; they met at port in Iceland; before parting to go on board their several vessels, the former gave to the latter a fine Newfoundland dog whom he had brought from France. Captain M. on coming into port at Granville, took on shore with him his Newfoundland dog, and soon lost sight of him. Captain P. M., four days later, entered his port of Paimpol, and as his boat approached the quay his Newfoundland swam out to meet him, to his infinite astonishment. Paimpol is more than thirty leagues from Granville, and to his master's knowledge, the dog had never been taken that road. This account, verified by M. Montsorel, is from the Revue Scientifique. Zoology abounds with marvels of this kind, but a greater marvel is that there are savants who deny a priori the existence of any analogous faculty in the human being, and who insist that he can perceive in no other way than by his senses in their ordinary state.—Revue Spirite.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE,

CHAMBERS: 16, CRAVEN STREET, CHANCERY CROSS, S.W.

This Society of Spiritualists, founded for the purpose, primarily, of uniting those who share a common faith, and then of giving information respecting that faith to those who seek for it, has now occupied Chambers at the above address. There will be found an extensive Library of works especially attractive to Spiritualists; the various Journals of Spiritualism published in this and other countries; and opportunities of converse with friends like-minded. The Alliance holds periodical Soirées at the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, where papers on interesting phases of the subject are read, and discussion is invited.

Particulars as to Membership (minimum Annual Subscription, One Guinea) may be obtained from the Hon. Sec.,

MORELL THEOBALD, Esq.,

62, Granville Park, Blackheath, S.E.

The following list, which will be continued by the courtesy of the editor until complete, will show what an important library is now available for use by members of the London Spiritualist Alliance. It is the desire of the Council that the books should be used by Spiritualists, and should not merely be available for consultation in our Chambers. To this end they have made arrangements for their being removed, under certain restrictions, for home reading. The publication of a catalogue in "LIGHT" will place at the disposal of every member a list which will enable him to select at his leisure what he may wish to read. Rules and regulations will be at once drawn up, so that the Library may be available without unnecessary delay.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has been thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobus, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (ont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"4th May, 1847.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—

I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglington, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglington, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglington, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobus.

Professor Jacobus, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through premeditation to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

THE "JOURNAL OF SCIENCE" ON SPIRITUALISM.

BY A. R. WALLACE, LL.D.

My article on the "Harmony of Spiritualism and Science," written for an American newspaper, and republished in "LIGHT" of May 30th, has been honoured by a notice in the Journal of Science, and I have been requested to make a few remarks in reply to the same. I cannot say that I myself think the criticism worth answering, because it is founded on assumptions which will, I am sure, not be granted by men of science in general; still, as they may present difficulties to some readers, it is perhaps as well to show their weakness.

The writer's main and fundamental objection is stated as follows:—

"Science is based upon what we, for want of a better name, term law. Spiritualism rests upon will. Science, and not merely our present science, but any possible science, so far as I can conceive it—takes its stand upon the causal nexus, upon the regular sequence of cause and effect. Iron always sinks in mercury, and always dissolves in hydrochloric acid, &c., &c."

In this passage and in what follows, the term "science" is completely misused. It is taken as synonymous with a limited branch of science, namely—physics. There are, however, whole regions of science in which there is no such regular sequence of cause and effect and no power of prediction. Even within the domain of physics we have the science of meteorology in which there is no precise sequence of effects; and when we come to the more complex phenomena of life we can rarely predict results and are continually face to face with insoluble problems; yet no one maintains that meteorology and biology are not sciences—still less that they are out of harmony with or opposed to science. The absence of uniformity, and the impossibility of predicting what will happen under all circumstances are not, therefore, confined to Spiritualistic phenomena alone. Assuming that they are so, however, the writer thus continues:—

"With the advent of Spiritualism all this beautiful simplicity has been swept away. If Spiritualists are not mistaken there are around us numbers of finite invisible beings, of unknown powers, and of unknown intentions capable of interfering with the order of nature. They can raise bodies in the air against the force of gravitation. They can kindle fires at pleasure, or deprive fire of the power of destroying organised beings or of occasioning pain. . . . To me it seems that, if these contentions are true, if there exist beings around us capable of exerting such powers, there are introduced, so to speak, into every equation a number of unknown quantities, rendering it for ever insoluble. We can only say 'such results will follow under such conditions, if no spirits think proper to interfere.' It seems to me that before any harmony can be shown between Spiritualism and science it must be ascertained what are the limits of the powers of these 'spirits' and under what conditions can they be exerted. In that manner only can a basis for science be saved."

In this passage there are both misstatements of fact and illogical conclusions. There is little or no proof that the "spirits" around us can of themselves do any of the things alleged. They require in almost every case, perhaps in every case, the assistance of human beings, and not only so, but of particular human beings with special organisations—those we term mediums. Here at once is a limitation to their power, and so great a limitation that the cases in which they can interfere with the ordinary effects of natural law are but very rare exceptions. Unless specially sought after, not one person in a thousand ever comes in contact with these phenomena, and even when sought for the general complaint is that they are exceedingly hard to find. To maintain that all science is impossible because once or twice in the lives of one person in a thousand some interference with the ordinary course of nature may occur, is about as sensible as to maintain that agriculture is impossible because phenomenal hailstorms may destroy, or exceptional whirlwinds may carry away, crops, or to give up all quantitative astronomical observation because earthquakes or terrestrial tremors, which cannot be predicted, may alter the level or the orientation of the instruments. And when we come to vital, and mental, and moral phenomena, we are still more subject to "unknown quantities in our equations." The apparently healthy man dies suddenly, while one who has always been weak and ailing lives to a good old age. The sober, moral, and religious citizen suddenly commits a horrible crime. The man of commanding genius becomes hopelessly insane. Yet these terribly real "unknown quantities" do not render either vital, or mental, or moral science impossible, still less do they place these studies altogether outside of science and in antagonism to it.

Again, as regards the impossibility of any science, as the critic alleges, where will intervenes, we have the human will as a constant factor in sociology, in anthropology, in ethical science, in history, in psychology, yet no one maintains that all these studies are opposed to science even if they have, as yet, no claim to rank among established or exact sciences.

Now, so far as we know, the will of spirits is no more erratic in its manifestations than the will of living men. It appears to be equally subject to general laws and influences, and, on the average, no more affects the orderly sequence of Spiritualistic phenomena than do the individual wills of human beings affect the orderly sequence of mental, social, or moral phenomena. It is a great mistake to impute all the uncertainty of phenomena with mediums to the erratic will of the spirits concerned. Very little is probably due to this cause, while the greater part is certainly owing to what may strictly be termed terrestrial conditions. We know something of these conditions already, and when we know more we have every reason to believe that much of the uncertainty will cease. Not less unsatisfactory is the remark with which our critic concludes this part of the subject:—

"To harmonise science with Spiritualism it will then be, in the first place, necessary to discover the limits of the power of spirits, under what conditions it is exerted, and how it may be combated when and where it is desirable."

But in all these respects Spiritualism is fully as advanced as is science itself. We know, practically, the limits of the power of spirits on this earth at the present day, and under ordinary conditions, quite as well as we know the limits of the power of earthquakes and volcanoes, of disease, of insanity, and of the human intellect, and we know how to combat their evil effects quite as well in our domain of observation as do men of science in theirs.

Then we have the bugbear of the "creation or destruction of energy" in Spiritualistic phenomena brought forward, and we are told that scientific men will seek for "precise answers" to the question where the power comes from "before they can accept the Spiritualist theories." But nobody asks them to accept the Spiritualist theories before they have investigated the Spiritualist facts.

It has usually been the boast of science that it accepts, and co-ordinates, and studies all the facts of nature in order to explain them; but with respect to our facts it applies a different rule and asks for a complete theory—a "precise explanation," before it will even begin to study them. We are informed that, in order—"To establish a harmony between Spiritualism and science it will be necessary, I submit, to show the origin of the energy which is at the disposal of spirits." But science itself does not yet know the "origin of the energy" of gravitation, yet the theory of gravitation is its proudest boast. Science only guesses at the "origin of the energy" of the magnet; and in tracing all terrestrial energy to the sun it only removes the difficulty one step, and cannot do more than make more or less probable guesses as to where the energy of the sun comes from. It is surely not scientific to demand of a new and very difficult science the complete solution of its most fundamental problems as a preliminary to recognising its existence, yet this is how the writer in the Journal of Science proposes to treat the students of Spiritualism.

The last passage I shall refer to is that in which the critic considers that Swedenborg was the victim "of delusion or imposture," because, while describing Jupiter and Saturn he said nothing about Uranus or Neptune. The assumption underlying this argument is, that if spirits exist and communicate with men they must necessarily know more of the material universe than men do, and must communicate their superior knowledge to us. This extraordinary misconception well illustrates the tone of mind of the writer, who has evidently given very little attention to the theories and conclusions of the more advanced of modern Spiritualists. He has yet to learn that the facts of Spiritualism are one thing, the value of the information obtained from Spiritualistic sources quite another thing. It is marvellous that so many people who deny that we have any evidence whatever of the existence of spirits, yet claim to know a priori exactly what spirits ought to know and ought to tell us, if they do exist!

MENTAL MEDIUMSHIP.—Mrs. Nellie Webster, of Corry, Pennsylvania, writes in Facts: "Dr. W. H. Powell, of Philadelphia, has had a séance at my house, with me and two friends. We wrote privately questions addressed to departed friends, signing our names. When the medium entered, the papers, folded alike, were separately handed to him in succession. He either dropped, or, if right, retained each a moment, then said to the presenter, 'Hold it in your hand.' Then he would seem to listen; then wrote the initials of the writer of the question; then the question; then the name of the spirit addressed. The answer would be given through him by speech, or he would take a slate, make passes over it, and write with the tip of his bare forefinger, and the answer would appear as if written by a slate pencil. In this way I received communications from my deceased husband and my sister."

ROMANCE AND FACT; A STORY OF REAL LIFE.

By SAMUEL EADON, M.A., M.D., PH.D.

Norton is a charming village in Derbyshire, about four miles from Sheffield. In the valley beneath runs the river Sheef, and the Meersbrook, separating, at this point, Yorkshire from Derbyshire. Higher up the valley are the ruins of Beauchief Abbey, embosomed in woods. About 130 years ago, lived at Norton Hall, a fine mansion near the village, the ancient family of the Offleys; and, at Norton House, directly opposite, resided a gentleman who owned large landed estates, named Newton. He was on terms of intimacy, socially and politically, with Mr. Offley. The latter died in 1759, leaving a son, Edmund, between eighteen and nineteen years of age, and two daughters, fourteen and eleven, to whom guardians were appointed. These guardians sent Edmund to Edinburgh to complete his studies, selecting as his tutor, although Edmund had been brought up a Nonconformist, a clergyman of the Church of England. Before settling in Edinburgh they made a tour through the Highlands, passing a few days on their way with the young Duke of Argyle, at Inverary. Edmund wrote home that his tutor was not used to polite society, and asked his guardians that he might be superseded by another; but they disregarded his request. When fixed in Edinburgh he made the acquaintance of Rev. G. Carr, minister of an Episcopal congregation, who introduced him to society. But the tutor reported unfavourably of Mr. Carr and of Edmund's proceedings, which brought distasteful letters from the guardians. Gradually such estrangement established itself that he ceased to correspond with his guardians and even with his family.

As soon as young Offley attained his majority, March 21st, 1754, he cut off the entail of the estates. On the 21st of June he executed a will, making the Rev. George Carr, with whose family he had domesticated himself, sole executor, and leaving the whole of his real and personal estates to him and his wife and their heirs for ever. Two months afterwards he died, Mr. Carr wrote, of "a fever, hastily, and unexpectedly." His body lay in state till September 1st, while arrangements were made for his interment at Norton. When the news reached Norton that he had deprived his sisters of the family fortune there was a burst of indignation from peer to peasant. The Duke of Devonshire, great grandfather of the present Duke, who had been a friend of Offley's father, said that Mr. Offley had not the power to alienate the ancestral property, and that he would spend £10,000 rather than the daughters of his good friend should be despoiled. It was thought that the young squire had been the subject of foul play. The gardener of Norton Hall said that he saw the wraith of his young master enter the hall-door at the very hour at which he died in Edinburgh. This was thought by some to be a Divine interposition for the purpose of leading to an investigation. Whether this should be viewed as a matter of "Divine interposition" may admit of question; but that the gardener (doubtless one endowed naturally with the power to see spiritual as well as material forms) saw the wraith of his young master, was a matter of belief.

The fact is, thousands of such appearances have been recorded. It is too late in the day for them to be put down to imagination. What is this imagination? Ask Stewart, and Reid, and Brown, and other metaphysical philosophers; and each will give a different version of it. It has been the camel to carry every bundle of the unknown along the sands of the mental desert through all time, whenever the learned attempted to pass from the confines of the material into those of the spiritual domain. It is a fact well authenticated, that the spirit of a man has come to friends the moment it had left the body, thousands of miles away. Spirit, set free, is independent of either space, or matter, or time,

The whole human race are merely millions of spirit-bodies, covered over with an organisation of flesh for temporary use in this life. The spirit-body is the man really. When the human spirit has ascended through the brain, and the silver cord been cut which connects the corporeal with the spiritual body—the real man has passed away into another state of being. It is not the material eye which sees, but the spirit eye, making use of a certain special material organisation created for the purpose; and so of the other senses. It is not the material brain that thinks, but the psyche, or soul, with the spiritual brain, using cerebral matter for its manifestations in this life; and so with all the other organs of the body. Some are born with what is called second sight, i.e., endowed with the power of seeing spirit without the interposition of a bodily medium. Thousands have been hung because they were endowed with this higher gift of nature. Shame on the ignorance of the world! This peculiarity has been met with in all ages, and in all grades of society; and it is, in fact, no other than the little cloud, in the heaven of mind, telling the nations and peoples of the earth what will universally happen, when, in the fulness of time, God shall bid the scales fall from all human eyes, and man see both worlds, and all their wonders and marvels without a veil between.

Whether the wraith of young Offley influenced the mind of Mr. Newton to defend the young ladies, so wrongfully deprived of their inheritance, we know not; but if not, there were other motives powerful enough to rouse Mr. Newton to battle against injustice. The guardians were supine; but he procured from them power to enable him to act as their delegate, armed with which he, accompanied by a friend, went to Edinburgh. On the road they met the corpse at Ferrybridge, on its way to Norton. Mr. Newton produced his authority to the men in charge, and they consented to remain with it at the inn till his return from Scotland. On his arrival in Edinburgh, accompanied by his friend and a lawyer, he proceeded to the house of the Rev. George Carr. Mr. Newton stated the objections to the validity of the will; that every effort would be made to upset it; that the Duke of Devonshire would give £10,000 towards legal expenses; that he himself would sacrifice every penny before such injustice should be perpetrated; that the young gentleman having made his will under the roof of those to whom he had left his property, without a friend of the family to advise with, or to be cognisant of what was done, was not to be tolerated; that the most rigid inquiry would be made as to his disease and the manner of death; that he had stopped the corpse at Ferrybridge to be submitted to a post mortem examination! At this, Carr stood panic struck. A second interview was agreed upon later in the day, when Carr and his wife agreed to accept £2,000 and relinquish all claims under the will.

Five years after the death of young Offley, one of the daughters married Mr. Samuel Shore, who afterwards resided at the Manor Hall at Norton, till he died in 1781. Mr. Offley Shore, his son, became partner in the old bank at Sheffield, under the designation of Parker and Shore.

Such was the romance enacted at Norton Hall about 130 years ago. Often great results depend on what appear to be very small incidents. Who could have thought that Mr. Newton's kind act to the children of his old friend, Mr. Offley, would ultimately have been pregnant with such great commercial results to a whole town, as it really has been to that of Sheffield? A great deal of the prosperity and enlargement of that rapidly-advancing town depended upon the success of Mr. Newton's mission to Edinburgh; as by the restitution of the property to the Offley family, the old bank of Messrs. Parker and Shore was enabled to lend a helping hand to thousands of deserving manufacturers, who without such help could not have pushed their way, some to affluence, and thousands to comfort. There can be no doubt, when a broad view is taken of this Norton romance, that this one kind act done by Mr. Newton for the Offley family, more than a century ago, has spread happiness through thousands of homes and for several generations; and many of their descendants at the present time little dream of the real origin of the comfort and happiness by which they are surrounded, viz., that of the visit of Mr. Robert Newton to Edinburgh about 130 years ago, on an errand of friendship, justice, and mercy.

ON MAGNETISATION IN NERVOUS DISORDERS.

(From the Journal du Magnétisme.)

The nervous system is subject to various strange disorders which, when they present themselves, as they most usually do, in the female sex, are included in the general term of "hysteria"—a standing perplexity to physiological physicians. It has been latterly recognised by some of them that hysterical subjects are most susceptible to the influence of metals. A treatment of nervous and other disorders by the application of metals was originated by the late Dr. Burq, and he called it Metallotherapia. This treatment has been taken up by Dr. Charcot at the Salpêtrière Hospital. He has made many experiments with it in treating hysterical subjects, and with results which have been surprising to him and his colleagues; and these results were found to be similar to those obtained, upon the same patients, by the incidence of electrical light upon them, the vibration of certain sounds, &c.

On these experiments of Dr. Charcot the eminent professor of physiology, M. Richet, remarks: "These experiments point to the probability that Metallotherapia acts solely by giving rise to feeble electrical currents which excite paralysed nerve-fibrils and revivify their sensibility."

Such experiments may, perhaps, lead M. Richet and other scientific investigators to inquire into the equally demonstrable magnetical and electrical influence between one human being and another, and which, as a therapeutic agent, they would find superior to that of metals.

This was the case with Mesmer. It was with metals that he first experimented; but he discovered that a real therapeutical force passed from himself, and that the action concurrently of the metals was superfluous.

For my part, having treated a vast number of patients suffering from all forms of hysteria, neuralgia, paralysis, epilepsy, chorea, &c., I am able to affirm, unhesitatingly, that there is no remedy equal to the human magnetical in efficiency.

I have observed, in practice, that, in all disturbances of the nervous system, there has been over excitation on the one hand and prostration on the other, general or partial.

It appears to me that, in a healthy subject, magnetic currents go from the centres of the nervous system to the periphery along the nerve-tracts and return to their points of departure, in a kind of flux and reflux; and that this is proper to the normal life of the individual. When physical or moral causes disturb or derange this current there is disturbance or derangement of the nerves through which the influence passes; hence alternations of increase and decrease of vitality in organs or parts, resulting in disorders more or less grave, manifesting themselves in a thousand forms, and ending, unless remedied, in organic changes difficult, if not impossible, to cure.

It is according to this rationale that I understand the action magnetically of a healthy subject, whose nervous system is in normal equilibrium, upon a subject whose nervous system is not in equilibrium; and that it is the best means for re-establishing order in that system. Once rapport is established between the magnetiser and the patient, the nervous currents in the latter begin to resume their normal course. When I magnetise patients in nervous attacks I observe that, in making passes from head to feet, the head and chest are the first to be visibly relieved. This corroborates the rationale that nervous disorders are attributable to deviation of the nerve-currents, with which congestions are concomitant.

It is to be noticed that in treating nervous attacks by human magnetism, they pass off with convulsive movements in the patient, analogous to the shocks accompanying the restoration of electrical equilibrium in nature. Laws ruling in nature, in the macrocosm, no doubt, rule also in the individual human being, the microcosm.

BERNARD RATAZZI.

THE HERMETIC SOCIETY.

The tenth and closing meeting of the summer session of this Society was held on the 1st inst. The subject—"The Communion of Saints"—was introduced by the president, Dr. Anna Kingsford, in a paper of which the following is an abstract:—

The series of papers on the Creed read before the Society last year, expounded on an interior and mystical plane the dogmas of the Christian faith, showing that a right belief in them is necessary to salvation, and that only by realising in the acts of the soul the acts of the Christ can theology be made an applied science and a means of grace. Step by step had been followed the nine great events of Christ's office as Redeemer and Lord, beginning with the Annunciation and ending with the Last Judgment, all these Stations and their Intermediaries being shown to represent so many stages of inward progress and evolution in the saintly life.

This spiritual method of interpretation has always been adopted by the mystics of the Church, with the result that faith became to them knowledge, that tradition was converted into experience, and that, apprehending Christ according to the spirit, they themselves were baptised with His baptism, drank of His cup, and ascended with Him in heart and mind into the Heavenly Kingdom of the inner life.

The ninth article of the Apostles' Creed, the Communion of Saints, interpreted on the same lines, is one of the highest importance and interest, constituting the bond subsisting between the Church visible and invisible, and implied in the inter-union and inseparability of the upper and lower triangles of the sacred Hexagon, or, "Seal of Solomon," which—referred to this plane—symbolises the eternal abiding of the Holy Ghost within and upon the Church, the indissoluble union of the Divine and human natures, and hence, the complement and perfectionment of earthly and material existence by the immanence of the world eternal and effulgent.

The Church, as thus symbolised, has three divisions, the celestial, the terrestrial, and the purgatorial; or souls in beatitude, souls in conflict, and souls in penance, or "in prison." The upper or celestial Church comprises, first, all just men made perfect, the spirits and souls of the righteous, who have attained the Ascension of Christ and passed into the rest of the Lord; and next above this part, all angels, thrones, principalities, dominions, and powers, belonging to the generation of the Gods or emanations, the cherubim, seraphim, and sephiroth; and, lastly, at the very apex, the Godhead itself. These are the three divisions of the upper triangle.

The lower triangle, which represents the Church terrestrial, comprises, reckoning from above downwards, first, the whole body of the elect upon earth who are instructed in the mysteries of Christ, and included in the dispensation of the Cross; next, all those who, being of any nation or creed whatsoever, have attained to the knowledge of these mysteries by inward initiation, but are not in open communion with the visible Church. Lastly, in the region, or condition, denoted by the nethermost section of the lower triangle, are the souls in prison, those who, not having yet attained to the consciousness of things spiritual, are in a state, not of grace, but of sin, and are undergoing the experience and purgation necessary for their salvation.

The Communion of Saints is the bond of solidarity by which all these divisions of the Church universal are held together and sustain each other by mutual charity. Christian doctrine insists that no man liveth or dieth to himself alone. The merits of the saintly are so many prayers applicable to the souls of all who desire aid and liberation. The oblation of Christ extends to all who exemplify and participate in Christ; and every such soul, according to its degree, becomes a fountain of grace flowing forth upon the world in benign spiritual effluences, a vehicle for the transmission of the Divine light and life which are of Christ. The just are thus fitly compared to the moon and the planets in the firmament of heaven, enlightening the earth by virtue of the reflected and duplicated glory which they derive from the central sun; and every holy and wise man is a distinct gain to the world.

These Divine occult influences are attracted especially to souls in affinity with them, the set of whose tendency is in the same direction, and who are united in intention with the particular energy which they dispense. The merits of a St. Francis of Assisi may peculiarly encourage one; the victory of a St. Mary Magdalene, or a St. Agnes, another; one may gather strength and light through the influence of some quiet and humble type of holiness; and another through the overshadowing of a St.

George, a St. Michael, or the bold prophet who was a voice crying in the wilderness. Not that the grace thus conveyed is necessarily derived through those who have been recognised and canonised by the Church. Even these are themselves but representative groups of valiant and victorious spirits forming as many constellations in the mystical firmament as there are phases of virtue and of grace, and focal points of heavenly effulgence, to the formation of which all ages and religions have contributed. A Hermes, a Buddha, a Pythagoras, a Socrates, a Daniel, a Hypatia, a Joan of Arc, each in his place and degree, not merely leaves a trail of glittering radiance across our heaven as he passes on his way to join the host triumphant, but continues evermore as a positive, actual, energising potency to reinforce and sustain the stream of his influence.

There is no force but will force, and prayer is the most potent, subtle and concentrated form of will force, and when exercised by souls whose whole energy is polarised and focussed upon its employment, attains its highest efficacy. The fervent prayer of the saint, therefore, avails much. His intention, united to the Divine will, becomes a miracle-working power. Not that natural law is arrested or suspended by it, but that it constitutes a higher activity of natural law, precisely as magnetic attraction constitutes a higher activity than that manifested in gravitation. To exercise such a force in its supremest mode, the mental and psychic energies must be restrained from being dissipated in the world, and assiduously cultivated and enhanced by means of seclusion and religious contemplation. Where the active energy of the individual is concentrated in a polaric cumulus, this becomes, as it were, a radiant point, emitting light and force of a peculiar and marvellous order. Such is the saint, who, whether dwelling on earth or departed from it, is a fountain of grace, and centre of vitalising power, dispensing Divine energy to mankind.

The commonwealth of the Church is a commonwealth of prayers, of good works, of sacramental grace, of meritorious acts. The members of Christ's body can do nothing alone. All pray and act for others and in the name of all, not vicariously, as substitutes one for another, for that would be subversive of justice; but eucharistically, by a communion of blessing and grace. In this manner souls profit one another, and give and receive benediction and help, both among the living and the departed. Not with lamentations and bewailings, then, should we celebrate our dead, for these detain and disturb; but with prayers and oblations and acts of Divine union performed on their behalf, earnestly desiring for them consolation and at-onement with God. For the death of the body is no barrier between soul and soul. Love does not die of death.

Such is one aspect of the Communion of Saints, in its relation to the threefold Church in the worlds of time and of eternity. But the saint has also special relations to God and to other saints. These are phases of the doctrine which are familiar to mystics both of East and West. The Communion of Saints with God consists in the relation held by the holy soul to heavenly environment. The status of any particular soul is determined by the capacity it develops for correspondence with its environment. The more circumscribed this correspondence, the lower the rank of the soul in the economy of the universe; the fuller this correspondence, the higher is that rank. The unspiritual man corresponds to the limited environment of the outer and lower world only, and is unable to recognise aught beyond this. In relation to all wider and higher environment he is dead. As for a creature without eyes, light and beauty exist not, so for a man without spiritual perception the spiritual world and the revelation of the Divine are not. "To be carnally minded is death." But when the soul rises into spiritual correspondence and develops a cognition and experience of Divine environment, it attains the communion which relates it immediately to God,—the Communion of Saints. In this holy condition all forms and modes of knowing are lost in actual union with the Divine. The highest of all attainments is to transcend knowing by being; to exchange the consciousness of outer things for that of the inner essence, and so to merge the finite selfhood of the man in the infinite selfhood of Deity, as to realise experientially the words of the Athanasian Creed, "One by the taking of the manhood into God." For the Communion of Saints and their conversation are in Heaven; the environment to which they respond is the Infinite Pleroma; the bonds of the limited selfhood are broken, and emancipation and apotheosis attained. God is the environment of the saint.

The communion of the saints with one another follows from their communion with God. They have all things in common Hermetic Society's Paper. A Correction.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I shall be obliged if you will insert the following correction of an unaccountable omission of two words from the abstract published by you of my paper on "Individuality," read to the Hermetic Society on the 24th inst. In the closing paragraph I am made to say "But not to know that it is a dream is just that Avidya (Ignorance) from which there can be no awakening." What I wrote was "lasting which there can be no awakening;" and I naturally object to an arbitrary alteration which completely destroys the sense of the passage.

C. C. M.

The Historic "Jesus."

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I do not think Mr. Roden Noel and the "leaders" of the Hermetic Society are so much in disagreement as Dr. Wyld seems to think.

The "leaders" of the Hermetic Society have never denied, nor wished to deny, the historic Jesus. They have but pointed out that not the historic but the spiritual Christ is the real essential of Christianity, and subject of the Gospels.

I have—speaking for myself—distinctly stated at recent meetings of our Society, that I should be grateful to anyone who could reconcile for me the difficulties and discrepancies abounding in the way of belief in the historical Jesus. I should be glad to receive any really logical and scholarly rectification and explanation of the many serious and important misstatements and inconsistencies undoubtedly existing in the Gospels. These difficulties do not concern mere details; but the chief facts of the life itself. I do not doubt the achievements of Napoleon, but then it is a matter of no moment to the souls of the world to-day whether Napoleon achieved anything or not. So neither I, nor any other person interested in eternal things, cares to verify his history or his acts. As for the miracles, they are no sort of difficulty to me. I am not in the position of the non-Spiritualist. But does not Dr. Wyld see that he proves too much in proving the modern phenomena of Spiritualism to be identical with the "mighty works" of Jesus? What, then, was Jesus no more and no greater than the medium of to-day, but merely a better medium?

I have said that I should be glad to be able to think the Gospel stories true, because so to think would bring me into closer union and harmony with many friends whose sympathy is dear to me. But, for myself, such a belief would add nothing to my faith in Christ. For I am quite sure that there is, virtually, no such thing as history. The things that are truly done, are not done on the historical plane; nor has any fact in the history of the world ever been truly chronicled. For no man can know any fact, and cannot, therefore, set it down. The knowledge one man has of any given fact is not the knowledge of another; man is incompetent to know facts, for he has no possible means of knowing them. Only Omniscience can know facts.

But man can and does know his own spiritual experience, and this is, indeed, the only needful knowledge. Jesus Christ comes in the flesh when He is incarnate in man; and this is the way in which He comes to all mystics; in which only He can come.

It does not matter to me, therefore, whether the Gospels are true or not on the merely outer plane. They are true, essentially, and, for my soul, my true self, the historical and the physical are not. Nothing done on that outer plane can save my soul; it must all be transmutated into spiritual terms and spiritual application before it can have any true saving value and grace.

As for the doctrine of rebirths, I do not want to enter into that question again, because already in these columns, in reply to Dr. Wyld, I once undertook a disquisition of some length about it. There are no rebirths any more for the soul that has found Christ Jesus, and is one with God. Unto which grace may we all be brought.

July 3rd.

ANNA KINGSFORD, M.D.

[We have also received a reply to Dr. Wyld from Mr. E. Maitland, which we hold over till next week. We do not desire to see a protracted correspondence on this subject in "LIGHT," and we must, therefore, beg those concerned to consider the matter closed after Dr. Wyld has had an opportunity of replying to Mrs. Kingsford and Mr. Maitland, should he desire to avail himself of it.—ED. OF "LIGHT."] because all that they have is God. At the topmost pinnacle of the pyramid of the religious life there is a single stone only, and that stone is Divine Love. This is the central point of the universe towards which all paths converge. Holy souls journey thither by many roads, but all are pilgrims to the self-same shrine. The last utterance of the saintly life, the final aspiration of the saintly heart, is always one whether we seek it in Vedanta, in Islam, in Hermetic illumination, or in Catholic mysticism. The Alexandrian school of Greek thought was, equally with the Oriental theosophies, pervaded by the spiritual thirst for union with the One and Eternal. The Enneads of Plotinus remain for ever a monument of earnestness to this end. The same spirit gave religious fervour to the noblest minds of the Christian age. The mystic passion for the Infinite which overhaunts the human soul, and breaks forth from Augustine in the cry, "Thou hast made us, O Lord, for Thyself, and we are restless until we return to Thee," breathes equally in the Vedic hymns, the sighs of Thomas à Kempis, and of Jeanne Guyon, the sermons of Tauler and Eckhart, and the thoughts of the writers of the "Germania Theologia," and of every devout prophet, poet, and seer of all times and lands.

It is through the Poverty of spirit spoken of in the Beatitudes that this union is attained. As says a mystic of the Sûfis, "Poverty is the treasure of the saints. For, until a man has stripped himself absolutely of all externals, of all sensory and illusory feelings and knowledges, he cannot possess the wealth of the interior and hidden excellence. Union with God is impossible in its completeness, so long as anything remains to the aspirant that hinders the immersion of the soul in the Divine Selfhood." "The secret of the mystic," says St. Dionysius, "is the secret of taking away; the path of the holy soul is the via negativa." And in the Upanishads we read: "Thrice let the saint say, 'I have renounced all.'"

It was a Moslem Sûfi who wrote the following exquisite apologue. "One knocked at the door of the Beloved's house, and a voice from within said, 'Who is there?' The lover answered, 'It is I.' The voice replied, 'This house will not hold me and thee.' So the door remained shut. The lover retired into a wilderness and spent his time in solitude, meditation, and prayer. A year passed; then he returned and knocked again at the door. 'Who is there?' said the voice of the Beloved. The lover answered, 'It is thou.' Then the door was opened."

Truth, as the Saint knows it, is wholly spiritual. For he perceives the primary where others behold only the secondary. He recognises the supreme verity that the real and absolute knows no past, and that salvation is independent of catastrophes. The primary in the Divine Intention is ever the spiritual, and of this the phenomenal and temporary is but the vehicle or dispensational mode. The first in time must be taken away that the last may be established. The reality of God cannot be confined or expressed within any definite personae or series of events. It transcends all presentations, whether of thought or life. For the soul, her ideal is equally true, whether yet realised or not. The Divine Incarnation, to be a manifestation of the Infinite, must consist in an endless progression. When man has wearied himself to despair in futile endeavours to seize and fix truth on the plane of sense and fact, if he be worthy and faithful God reveals to him the higher plane of the noumenal and Divine, where alone truth eternally abides. Then he perceives the things he had formerly regarded as essential to be sacramental only, an elemental veil, preserving and concealing from vulgar touch and taste the true and adorable Body and Blood of the Lord. For, indeed, all religious formulas and functions are sacramental; all theologic knowledges, relative. The Church on earth is the great Mystagogue, unfolding in images the wisdom that is hidden. And only when the inward and spiritual grace is attained is the outward and visible sign known for what it is worth. According to the Moslem mystics, all the religions of the world are the selfsame wine in different glasses. Poured by God into one mighty chalice, they then become indistinguishable.

To find this interior and only truth, to realise Christ in the soul, to crucify the human will, to burn up all earthly passion in the fire of Divine love, to rise into newness of life, to ascend up beyond all heavens, and to abide in the secret place of God,—these Divine operations are indispensable for the mystic and the saint; this process the sole means to the goal of all aspiration—union with God. In this transcendent love for God the love of the brethren is enfolded and embosomed. The saint has communion with the Church in Heaven and on earth, because he has communion with God.

The paper was followed by a discussion of a highly interesting and instructive character, many of the fundamental points of Hermetic doctrine being expounded, and their accordance with Christian doctrine exhibited. The attendance was larger than at any previous meeting, the large room of the Royal Asiatic Society being crowded.

HOW IS PREJUDICE TO BE OVERCOME?

A professor of science a short time ago was asked the question, "If, under what appeared test conditions, you witnessed some of the phenomena of Modern Spiritualism, such, for example, as the rapid materialisation and dematerialisation of apparently living human forms, or writing in various languages within carefully closed slates, would you accept them as facts?" He replied, "No amount of evidence could convince me of their genuineness; there is nothing in my mental nature with which they would harmonise. I would rather believe myself insane, than believe that the alleged phenomena were genuine."

A strong case of this kind is not of frequent occurrence, but similar views, variously modified, are very prevalent, and the vast majority of educated men believe the phenomena to be impossible, and therefore unworthy of thought or investigation of any kind.

The possibility of the extreme case quoted is apparent rather than real. There is not any sane man who can finally resist manifestly conclusive evidence, and the dogmatic rejection of known facts can only remain stereotyped and permanent by refusing to examine evidence, it being impossible to reject facts if they occur frequently; and, under test conditions, they must in the end command acceptance, and the bitterest and most conservative unbeliever must at last yield to the force of cumulative evidence.

The double proposals which have recently appeared in the columns of "LIGHT," viz., the examination of testimony and cross-examination of competent witnesses by the executive of the Society for Psychical Research, and the publication of carefully observed and recorded phenomena, apart from theories, by well-known and fully accredited investigators, are possibly the best means of directing general attention to the singular phenomena of Modern Spiritualism.

The value of these two forms of evidence would be increased by the systematic republication of the early records of Modern Spiritualism, and specially the evidence of such men as Wm. Howitt, Dr. Ashburner, S. C. Hall, Newton Crossland, Professor de Morgan, Robert Chambers, Robert Stephenson, Benjamin Coleman, Robert Bell, Dr. Dexter, Judge Edmonds, Professor Hare, Epes Sargent, Dale Owen, Dr. Gully, Dr. Garth Wilkinson, Dr. Elliotson, Cromwell Varley, Dion Boucault, Professor Zollner, Lloyd Garrison, President Lincoln, Adin Ballou, Rev. C. Beecher, and scores of other well-known scientists and literati, the majority of whom have passed away from this life, and whose testimonies are scattered throughout the Spiritualistic literature of the past thirty years. Few now have access to the stirring old literature of the movement, and a systematic publication of old and recent evidence, supported as far as is practicable by the critical cross-examination of living witnesses, would constitute a work the influence of which few candid and judicial minds could effectually resist. If the evidence of testimony succeed in influencing the pronounced unbelievers in modern Spiritual phenomena, so far as to induce surprise at its quantity and quality, and at the apparent trustworthiness, self-sacrifice, and capacity of the witnesses, the contest would be practically won; because it would probably lead to careful examination, and such examination, by a mind not too deeply prejudiced, would, in the majority of cases, result in a conviction of the genuineness of the phenomena, and the influence in a large proportion of cases would be in favour of the Spiritual hypothesis.

The fact that the witnesses have nothing personally to gain by the avowal of their experiences, but, on the contrary, much temporary reputation to lose, ought in some measure to command respect, and induce those who at present disbelieve both phenomena and inferences, to at least investigate, and if possible, discover the truth, or expose the delusion. It is true that many unbelievers have honestly and fully attempted to expose the supposed delusion, with the remarkable result that they have all become more or less converts to a belief in the genuineness of the phenomena.

MR. GEORGE PEDDLE, of West End-road, High Wycombe, would like to meet other inquirers into Spiritualism residing in that neighbourhood.

At a meeting of the Committee of Management of the Royal Academy of Music, held on July 1st, Mr. Charlton Speer, son of Dr. Speer, was elected a professor of the piano-forte in that institution.

THE attention of subscribers and friends is particularly requested to our advertisement on page ii. Under no circumstances whatever can applications be received after July 26th for England, and after August 31st for the Australian Colonies.

THE Society for Psychical Research owe much to Spiritualism. As a matter of fact not a few of its members have been interested in occult research through witnessing the phenomena occurring in the presence of Mr. W. Eglinton. The latest instance of this is the acceptance of honorary membership in the Society for Psychical Research, by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone.

A SPIRITUALIST and journalist of many years' standing desires to engage in literary work of any kind. Manuscripts prepared for and put through the Press. Compilations, abstracts, and critiques supplied, &c. References to Rev. W. Stainton Moses, M.A. ("M. A. Oxon."), Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, of the National Press Agency, and many others.—Address, A.B., care of the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND.—The discourse announced in our last issue for delivery on Sunday evening last, was given in a most able manner, and was listened to with great attention. A number of questions submitted to the chairman by inquirers were first answered by the guides. After the address an impromptu poem was given, on "Our Father Who art in Heaven." The subject announced for next Sunday, which will conclude the present series, is "The Final Religion of the Earth."

MRS. HARDINGE-BRITTEN IN NEWCASTLE AND DISTRICT.—This highly-gifted lady is announced to lecture as follows:—Newcastle, Weir's Court Hall, July 12th, in morning upon "The Origin of Races"; in the evening upon "The Philosophy of Hypatia." On July 13th, at 7.30, upon "The Earth and Her Destiny." At Burradon, near Seghill (School-rooms), July 11th, at 6.45 p.m., upon "There is no Death; or, Man and his Great Future Life." At North Shields Society's Rooms, in Camden-street, July 15th, in the evening upon "Death and the After Life."

WE are requested to announce that, under the new arrangements, the Psychological Press, 16, Craven Street, Charing Cross, are prepared to supply any book published in America, in Australia, or on the Continent. They have made an arrangement direct with Messrs. Colby and Rich, of Boston; Colonel J. C. Bundy, of Chicago; and Mr. Terry, of Melbourne, whereby the publications issued by their respective houses can be supplied within a reasonable time. Friends will advance an important work if they will entrust their orders to the Psychological Press.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions: (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

CLASSES O. AND R.—PSYCHOGRAPHY AND MISCELLANEOUS PHENOMENA.

Seance at Mr. Eglinton's. Five p.m. Monday, 29th June, 1885. Present (besides the medium): Major Taylor, Mr. Leonard.

The three gentlemen took their seats round the table in the usual manner, Major Taylor, who was seated at Mr. Eglinton's right hand, holding with his left hand Mr. Eglinton's left hand. Mr. Leonard, sitting on the right of Major Taylor, held with both hands Major Taylor's right hand. Mr. Eglinton's right hand was disengaged.

The seance lasted for over half-an-hour, and no results whatever were obtained, though Mr. Eglinton was holding a slate under the table in the usual way.

Conversation turned upon an experiment that Major Taylor had made at a previous seance, when the number of matches in a match-box, from which an indefinite number of matches had been removed by two or three sitters, had been correctly written on the slate.

Mr. Eglinton regretted that, on the occasion referred to, the match-box had not been marked, for (he suggested) a Sadducean world would say that another match-box, with a known number of matches, had been substituted for the one being used in the experiment.

It was determined to repeat the test, taking every precaution that could be thought of.

Major Taylor chanced to have in his pocket a box of "Tandstickor" matches. Major Taylor and Mr. Leonard then went aside to the window and marked with their initials both the box and cover. Major Taylor then removed a large number of the matches, leaving an unknown quantity in the box.

Mr. Leonard then replaced a few (he knew not how many) in the box.

A slip of paper was placed above the matches in the box, and the box was closed.

Neither gentleman knew how many matches were then contained in the box.

All this was done out of sight of Mr. Eglinton.

The slate was then carefully cleaned and examined. A piece of slate pencil, with sharp facets, was placed on the slate.

The match-box was placed on the slate, and the slate (with match-box and pencil on it) was held by Mr. Eglinton under the table, with his right hand.

Some ten minutes elapsed, during all which time Mr.

Eglinton's thumb was observed by Major Taylor to remain above the table. Mr. Eglinton, being then tired of holding up the slate, placed it on the table and covered it with another slate.

Mr. Leonard suggested that a newspaper should envelope the whole.

The slates were again examined, and a newspaper wrapped round them, the fold of the newspaper being nearest Mr. Eglinton, and the open ends facing the other sitters.

Mr. Eglinton placed his hands on the newspaper, one of them being joined to Major Taylor's, and while both the hands of the medium were in full view of both gentlemen, the sound of writing was heard.

Major Taylor removed the newspaper and then the top slate, and "16" was found to have been written on the bottom slate. Major Taylor opened the match-box, and he and Mr. Leonard counted the matches, finding sixteen of them.

The slate pencil was found to be slightly abraded.

The box and cover were identified as the same that had been marked.

It was thought that all possibility of fraud had been eliminated in this experiment, and it was therefore concluded—from this and other results of a similar nature—either (1) That there was an intelligent entity at work apart from the medium and the sitters; or (2) that (a) in addition to having clairvoyant power (b) the medium was able, consciously or unconsciously, to influence matter in some abnormal way.

CLASS L.—MATERIALISATION.

On Friday evening, September 3rd, 1875, a seance for materialisation was held in an upper sitting-room, the size of which was 14ft. 6in. by 12ft. 6in. In one corner of the room an angle 4ft. by 3ft. 9in. was screened by a suspended curtain. Sitting in a quadrant of a circle and at a distance of from six to seven feet from the curtain, were the following persons, who sat in the order recorded:—Mr. Mo., Mr. M., Mrs. H., an American; Mr. H., a gentleman from Edinburgh; Miss P., Mr. F. H., Mr. Barkas, Mr. P. The medium was Mrs. P., a married lady about forty years of age.

We first sat hand in hand round a table and had knocks and writing, instructing us to put the table within the curtained recess above referred to, and sit for materialisation outside of the recess. The medium, Mrs. P., and her little daughter, Fanny, sat on two chairs facing the curtained recess at a distance of three feet from the curtain. The company sat, also facing the curtain, at a distance of about seven feet from it as above described. A lamp was burning within three feet of where I sat and with such brightness that I could see all persons in the room and could easily read time by my watch. I could see both mediums with ease, and the space between them and the curtain.

After sitting about fifteen minutes we were told to remove the table from the recess, and materialisation would take place. The table was removed, and mediums and sitters sat in the open room in the same order as before.

After sitting about ten minutes a small, white, flickering, flame-like substance about the size of a man's hand, appeared above the knees of the lady medium, her hands being by her sides during the whole of the seance. It increased and diminished in size and brightness, and at last continued to grow until it covered the head, shoulders, and body of the medium in a fleecy, white, semi-transparent cloud. It then took a more solid and definite shape, and descending to the floor, appeared like a young female, at least five feet in height. This form moved freely about the room, was visible about fifteen minutes, and gradually declined in height and width where it stood, until the form was about eighteen inches high, and during the whole time I saw the hand of the medium hanging passively at her side. This small white form again began to rise and increased in bulk, until it resembled a stooping old lady, who moved freely on the floor; she wore white, flowing garments, and had on her head a large, old-fashioned, Quaker-like bonnet; she touched the hands of four of the sitters, taking them between her finger and thumb, and also permitted them to feel her dress. This animated form was visible for about twenty-five minutes, and at one time it increased greatly in bulk, rose to a height of about eight feet, and completely overshadowed the medium. The form again descended, assumed a normal size, and coming forward past the lady medium took a hand of one of the sitters between its finger and thumb; the form then returned to a position about two feet from the medium, and four feet from where I sat, and gradually declining in size and distinctness it flickered away on the carpeted floor. This closed a very remarkable séance. I have without comment given a plain unvarnished record of facts, which could be confirmed if necessary by those who were present.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXV.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

My suggestion as to the advantage that might be gained from a public prosecution of some good medium, seems to have been taken in the State of Ohio before I made it. At a preliminary examination before a justice of the peace, an eminent lawyer testified that he had made a careful examination of the phenomena of Spiritualism, and had no doubt of their reality. Others confirmed his testimony, and a large body of sworn evidence was brought before the public and reported in the newspapers.

The testimony in the case of Slade was declared by the Bow-street magistrate, the successor of Fielding, Mr. Flowers, to be "overwhelming," but as it was contrary to the "well-known laws of nature," Slade was sentenced, in spite of the overwhelming evidence, to three months' imprisonment. The laws of nature, as understood by a Bow-street magistrate, stood against any amount of testimony.

As we go on in the path of progress, we care less and less for these "well-known laws of nature." We see them violated on every side. They are broken at every séance. They are set aside in mind-readings and faith-healings. Thousands of Spiritualists all over the world have seen, heard, and felt things which no one can possibly reconcile with what are called the laws of nature—with what usually happens.

It usually happens that water comes down from the clouds in gentle showers—but the other day a "waterspout" in Mexico destroyed some hundreds of people. How such a mass of water was sustained in the air is a puzzle to science. Sea fishes fall far inland. So common a law as gravitation may be suspended by forces we know nothing about. Our work is to register facts whatever they may be. The why and the how must wait.

In a recent number of the Spectator is a very clever discussion of the theory of mind-reading or transfer of thought in its relations to some of the phenomena of Spiritualism. For example, the Rev. P. H. Newnham writes a series of questions in one room which are answered in another by the Planchette on which Mrs. Newnham is resting her fingers. She gave, in this way, many things utterly unknown to her—for example, some Masonic prayers.

For example, Mr. Newnham in one room wrote: "Write out the prayer used at the advancement of a Mark Master Mason." And the answer came: "Almighty Ruler of the Universe and Architect of all worlds, we beseech thee to accept this, our brother, whom we have this day received into our most honourable Company of Mark Master Masons. Grant him to be a worthy member of our brotherhood; and may he be in his own person a perfect mirror of all Masonic virtues. Grant that all our doings may be to thy honour and glory, and to the welfare of all mankind.' This prayer was written off instantaneously and very rapidly. It is a very remarkable production indeed. For the benefit of those who are not members of the Craft, I may say that no prayer in the slightest degree resembling it is made use of in the ritual of any Masonic degree; and yet it contains more than one strictly accurate technicality connected with the degree of Mark Mason. My wife has never seen any Masonic prayers, whether in 'Carlisle,' or any other real or spurious ritual of the Masonic Order." Here, then, assuredly, was a formula composed by some intelligence totally distinct from the conscious intelligence of either of the persons engaged in the experiment.

The writer in the Spectator says: "We are assured that Mrs. Newnham, leaning back in her chair, sitting with her eyes shut, and a single finger on the Planchette, could get long and rapid answers on subjects not in the least present to her thoughts." A mind other than her own moved her fingers, or, as it seemed to her, moved the Planchette and her finger, and wrote things of which she had not the least knowledge.

This is interesting—but the writer in the Spectator might find much better facts in direct spirit writing. There are now innumerable witnesses to the facts of intelligent communications being written on enclosed slates, on paper shut in books or boxes, where, so far as we can see, any communication with any human brain was impossible.

In these cases why dispute the only testimony we have? For example, I hold in my hands a pair of slates, carefully, securely fastened and sealed. I hear the sound and feel the tremor of writing. Opening my packet I find a letter addressed to myself, in a well-known handwriting, signed by a well-known name—those of a person no longer living in our natural sensible condition. How am I to explain a fact like this upon any but the spiritual theory? Some spirit, having a power over matter of which we can have no conception, has done the work. What reason have I to doubt that it is the spirit it pretends to be? But, in any case, it is the work of a spirit.

Really the more simple the phenomenon, the more convincing it is. The first we heard of—thirty odd years ago—the raps, were admirably adapted to call attention and then convince those who heard them that they were made by spirits. The Rochester knockings called attention, answered questions, spelled messages. Away from the medium—from any person who could have rapped—you not only heard the rap but felt the jar. In thirty years of almost continuous observations nothing has been more solidly certain than those original raps.

A writer in The Agnostic is curiously more "no Popery" than even the Rock or the Protestant Standard. "Even in the Government," he says, "there are [were?] zealous friends of Popish priestcraft, who are eagerly anxious to drag us back into the darkness, superstition, bigotry, flummery, and persecution of the Popish Church. But outside this little island, there are two hundred millions of rabid Roman Catholics, whose subtle cant and venomous priestcraft are perpetually welling up among us and threatening to overwhelm us. Sixty years ago a Roman Catholic was scarcely known in this country; now we are probably one-third Papists. And this vastness of cant and treachery will—perhaps before long—lure us into a trap, and utterly extinguish the only spark of freethought and mental daylight there is in the world."

If the progress of education and common-sense were not enough to save the world from such calamities, Spiritualism will do its part. America is Spiritualistic. England is becoming so day by day. France, Germany, Russia are in process of conversion. The knowledge of the facts of spirit life and power has placed a vast body of thoughtful men and women quite above the influence of any fanaticism whatever. Faith is supplanted by knowledge. When the facts of the spirit-life are known there is an end to all delusions. Only an utter Agnostic could have written such nonsense.

The Agnostic, as a know-nothing magazine, naturally ignores Spiritualism. If its writers would but condescend to know what is really going on in the world about them—if they could open their eyes to the facts most worthy of their observation, neither the Pope nor General Booth would seem so very alarming. The men and women who have lived upon our earth are wiser than they were, and are able now to give us the benefit of their experience. The Inquisition is no more possible in Spain than the relighting of Smithfield fires in England.

The effect of Spiritualism on morals is evident. We are not so likely to disregard our duties to those whom we expect to meet again as we might be if such an event were impossible. The belief that those whom we have known and loved are near us, and know our thoughts and acts, cannot be other than a good influence. The absolute knowledge of the fact of continuous existence should gradually change the moral aspect of the world. In this matter Spiritualism demonstrates what Christianity declares respecting the "great cloud of witnesses" that ever gathers around us.

We can fairly claim that the demonstration of the facts of spirit existence and spirit power must have a great effect upon human conduct. The mere possibility that we may meet with those we wrong, cannot but have a restraining influence. The effect of a general knowledge that immortality is a demonstrated fact must be to change the whole aspect of human society.

One Dr. York, lecturing at the Opera House on Sunday nights to crowded audiences, on "Matter, Mind, and Spirit" (we cannot tell whether in America or Australia), holds that mind being only a refinement of matter, Spiritualism is probable on scientific grounds. "As a religion it had no value in his eyes, but as a fact from which a philosophy of life might be deduced to broaden, deepen, sweeten, and purify the moral nature of man, it would be of considerable importance." Eliminating self-delusion and deliberate fraud, he admitted there was "sufficient to engage the attention of science, and to render probable the existence of human intelligence in higher conditions of life."

A private letter recently received by me from a most trustworthy witness, and a capable and shrewd observer, mentions having been present at a séance with Mrs. Ross, of Boston, and that no less than eight spirits materialised at one time, four inside and four outside the cabinet.

No doubt necromancy, or holding intercourse with the spirits of the dead, as Saul did with Samuel, through the mediumship of the Witch of Endor, was punished, with nearly a hundred other offences, with death by stoning, but this is a proof that such intercourse with the dead was a fact then as now.

Elder Evans, an American Shaker, points out the similarities between Modern Spiritualism and the Salem witchcraft for which so many were imprisoned and hanged, drawing his facts from that extraordinary reservoir, Allen Putnam's "New England Witchcraft." Elder Evans holds that "in 1692 the spirit-world came down upon, and entered into, the natural world, just as it is now doing. In 1842 the Beechers, in New York, declared that Spiritualism was real—but that it was of the devil"—as the religious papers in London are doing now. Meantime a sister of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is holding Spiritual Conferences in her Beacon-street drawing-room, attended by the élite of Boston.

The Lancet attributes the faith cures to the well-known influence and curative power of mesmerism. The latter it attributed some years ago to excited hope. What people denied yesterday they use to-day to account for something more difficult of belief. Why not examine facts and accept them as facts, without waiting to find other facts to which they may be related? There are millions of facts we cannot now account for, vast numbers of which we may never in this life be able to explain. When we have not even a clue to the causes of nature or the modes of its operations, how silly to withhold our belief in any phenomenon until we know how it is produced.

The "Christian Scientists," or "mind-curers" of Boston think they are curing General Grant. Eighteen persons are at work for him. They do not pray—not that they know of. They only unite in thinking of him, so that the influence of their united mental power is bringing him into the "understanding of God"—whatever that may be. But how this differs from mesmerism, which, it is claimed, can act by united effort and at any distance, it would be rather difficult to explain.

The principle of Faith-healing, as explained by the Rev. A. B. Simpson, of New York, is simplicity itself. All disease is of the devil, and came in with the Fall. Take away sin, and all disease goes with it. Health and holiness are one, as the two words have the same derivation. Conversion is sanitation. Christ continues to heal all manner of diseases—and so on; so that an invalid Christian is a contradiction in terms. Every D.D. is an M.D., and vice versa; and Mrs. General Booth's treatise on Water Cure, reprinted in the July Herald of Health, is naturally of no use to any but unconverted sinners, while every ache is a system of diabolic possession, and no real Christian can have the rheumatism.

Looking over the "Records of Phenomena Wanted," observe that I can give accounts from personal observation of eleven out of fifteen of the kinds specified. Some investigators may have had larger opportunities, and there are now in this country alone hundreds—perhaps thousands—of intelligent and quite competent investigators. What a body of testimony to gather and arrange! And what a work for the Society for Psychical Research!

Still I think my plan of "trying the spirits" or the mediums with all the formalities of criminal jurisprudence would be more interesting. In the mean time let us have the "Records of Phenomena." If every reader of "LIGHT" will do his or her share we shall soon have a most interesting and valuable volume. Meanwhile, will not the editor give us a neat little model of the sort of record he would like to have, so that we contributors may waste no more time and ink than are necessary? Or publish two or three of the best out of the first hundred received.

These recorded facts to which competent witnesses are ready to testify, will be of great value to many others besides Spiritualists. Writers in the lower stratum of religious journals insist that the phenomena, which they admit by forming a theory, are the work of the devil. They need the facts to make good their hypothesis. So do they who contend that it is all trickery and imposture. Whatever our theories we all want the facts.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

WEST HARTLEPOOL.—On Sunday evening, a lecture was delivered at Brunswick-street Hall, by Mr. W. Robinson, of Newcastle, his subject being "Do we Heal by Faith or Knowledge?" The healing influence, which had been for a long period exercised by Spiritualistic mediums, was but a reproduction of arts well-known and celebrated by the priests of India, Egypt, Persia, and Greece in their palmy days, and by Moses. Faith, or magnetic healing of the body, would constitute one of the most potent weapons which the Church would bring into future requisition. The law of opposites, and especially that of sex, was an important factor in good healing. No healer ought, under any circumstances, to lay hands on another unless in perfect sympathy with the recipient. If cross-mesmerism were introduced, or if diseased individuals, or those who practise filthy habits, attempted to heal, such ought to be discouraged at once, as the effects might be disastrous. Each individual might constitute himself a magnetic "battery" of healing force, and this vast power might be incalculably supplemented by invisible potencies. Spiritual investigations had demonstrated the fact that myriads of beneficent invisible men and women were waiting upon the wings of thought to minister to human needs through pure organisms, and thus this human power was everywhere intensified by a Divine power, manifesting itself by Spiritualism as a deifying instrument. In all civilised cities, towns, and villages—especially in buildings associated with religious exercises—and places ought to be dedicated to healing purposes, officered with a trained staff of robust, healthy, sympathetic male and female healers, whose sole ministrations would be the natural methods of laying on of hands. The lecture was listened to with evident interest, and Mr. Robinson promised to give his concluding lecture on an early visit and explain the methods of making the various passes on patients.

BERLIN.—W. Friedrich, the publisher here, has brought out a work on Spiritism, by Dr. W. V. Hartmann. In it, he classifies the alleged facts of Spiritism and comments upon them. He declares that an exhaustive study of them is demanded by natural philosophy, physiology, psychology, and psychiatry. Although he does not conclude that the soul survives the dissolution of the body, his work is replete with interest to Spiritists. He is merciless against the scientific arrogance which refuses to investigate facts, and which charges the adherents of new sciences with being fools and liars. Dr. Hartmann has dealt a strong blow in favour of our propaganda. —Le Spiritisme.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

CHAMBERS: 16, CRAYEN STREET, CHANCING CROSS, S.W.

This Society of Spiritualists, founded for the purpose, primarily, of uniting those who share a common faith, and then of giving information respecting that faith to those who seek for it, has now occupied Chambers at the above address. There will be found an extensive Library of works especially attractive to Spiritualists; the various Journals of Spiritualism published in this and other countries; and opportunities of converse with friends like-minded. The Alliance holds periodical Soirées at the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, where papers on interesting phases of the subject are read, and discussion is invited.

Particulars as to Membership (minimum Annual Subscription, One Guinea) may be obtained from the Hon. Sec.,

MORELL THEOBALD,

62, Granville Park, Blackheath, S.E.

The following list, which will be continued by the courtesy of the editor until complete, will show what an important library is now available for use by members of the London Spiritualist Alliance. It is the desire of the Council that the books should be used by Spiritualists, and should not merely be available for consultation in our Chambers. To this end they have made arrangements for their being removed, under certain restrictions, for home reading. The publication of a catalogue in "LIGHT" will place at the disposal of every member a list which will enable him to select at his leisure what he may wish to read. Rules and regulations will be at once drawn up, so that the Library may be available without unnecessary delay.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Frische, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epas Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübke, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1838), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROSWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville, published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (tout de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglington, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglington, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglington, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, oder Licht April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two Brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in 'mesmerism,' and also the individuality of the spirit 'in spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number; if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI.

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitches of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good, and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

THE

HARMONY OF SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

A REJOINDER TO MR. ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, LL.D.

By FREDK. F. COOK.

Speaking after the manner of the world, I recognise in Spiritualism no voice equally authoritative with that of Alfred Russel Wallace. None, in my opinion, has brought to the investigation of Spiritualistic phenomena better disciplined faculties, a freer or less prejudiced spirit of inquiry, and, above all else, none has been truer to his lights. Behind the great scientist has always been clearly discernible the greater man—the lover of justice. Feeling thus, it is with considerable reluctance that I constrain myself to withhold unqualified approval from any public utterance or statement of his. While I may differ from him somewhat as to the relation subsisting between Spiritualism and science, no difference of opinion in that regard could induce me to utter a word of dissent, were it for no other reason than that it would not be becoming in one who is not a scientist, in the legitimate sense of that term, to enter the lists against so distinguished an authority in science. And even along lines of deduction and speculation (where the terms on which we might meet would be much nearer equal), I should still hesitate to take issue with him, were it not for what I trust is a pardonable concern, that Spiritualism and all that flows from it shall not be judged at less than its best, its profoundest revelations, its deepest and completest explanation of the mystery of being.

Spiritualism was never so live a subject in this country as at the present time, and, consequently, the article from the pen of Mr. Wallace, published in the Boston Herald some time ago, is attracting an unusual amount of public attention. The whole tone of the statement is admirable, the scientific presentation of the case is remarkably conservative in comparison with the "claims" usually put forward in behalf of Spiritualism by pseudo-scientific believers, and it is only when Mr. Wallace enters upon the deductive or purely philosophical aspects of his subject that he fails to be at his best. Nothing, for example, could be finer than this:—

"Modern science utterly fails to realise the nature of mind, or to account for its presence in the universe, except by the mere verbal and unthinkable dogma that it is 'the product of organisation.' Spiritualism, on the other hand, recognises in mind the cause of organisation, and, perhaps, even of matter itself, and it has added greatly to our knowledge of man's nature by demonstrating the existence of individual minds indistinguishable from those of human beings, yet separate from any human body."

This is the true Spiritualistic position, and the line that demarcates it from the ordinary scientific point of view could hardly be more clearly drawn. If this statement of Mr. Wallace means anything, it must mean that spirit is superior to matter, was therefore before matter, and perforce possessed all that matter does not possess—the essentials of being. Yet, on reading further, I find that this is not at all what Mr. Wallace means, for he has this to say:—

"On the spiritual theory man consists essentially of a spiritual nature and mind intimately associated with a spiritual body or soul, both of which are developed in, and by means of, a material organism."

To my mind this is a plain case of spiritual suicide. And when he regards the idea apart from the particular application of it, Mr. Wallace thinks so too; for have I not already quoted him as saying "Modern science utterly fails to realise the nature of mind, or to account for its presence in the universe, except by the mere verbal and unmistakable dogma that it is the product of organisation"? Let us bear in mind that we are not now dealing with phenomena, but with an everlasting and eternal verity—with the essence of being. Has matter this essence? Obviously no. Is it then permissible for us to assume that it is the one thing in the universe that is able to go outside of its own nature, and impart what it has not itself, i.e., the essence of being, consciousness? Phenomena modify phenomena, but do they also modify essences? When we speak in terms of evolution of things-in-themselves, are we not bound to presuppose a process of involution freighted with all that evolution under the most favourable conditions is able to express? The case is plainly this: Either matter does it all, or matter does essentially nothing but call out what is already in. Now, what is it that rests at the basis of being? Obviously it is consciousness. Therefore, if spirit is the essence of being, it must be in and of itself conscious. When we say "man is a spirit," what do we mean? Does mortality give consciousness to spirit, or does spirit give consciousness for a limited period to mortality? Here we have plainly the whole distinction between Materialism and Spiritualism in a nutshell, and the day is not far distant when the terms in which the distinction is expressed cannot be juggled with. This new wine is not for old bottles. Immortal things are eternal things, eternal things are unchangeable things; what is called out of being into phenomena must not by any confusion either of terms or of ideas be put into being. From being nothing can be wrested—to being nothing can be added. However being may exhibit itself phenomenally, essentially it must ever remain unchanged. Potential energy in essence has nothing added to it through any phenomenal exhibit such as we have in active energy. And what is not potential can never become active—and, by a parity of reasoning, what is not in the spirit consciously can never be put into it by any process that is admittedly unconscious. Plainly, then, consciousness must be for us a yield of the spirit and not of matter. Man is neither more nor less than the momentary battle-ground between the two. Spirit informs matter for the purpose of overcoming it. Matter resists. This conflict, realising itself in consciousness of spirit, gives us the phenomena called Man, and when the conflict is over there is an end of man—thereafter you realise yourself as spirit only, and what gives you the larger stature is that as spirit you realise yourself in your entirety—as a complete consciousness, instead of as a succession of states of consciousness. To express spirit in terms other than consciousness is to express it in terms of matter or in terms of nothing—the Unknowable of Unknowables.

Far be it from me to dogmatise about what is possible and what is not possible in the universe. Yet among thinking men, among men thoroughly grounded in the fundamental conceptions of science and philosophy, a few things are posited as fixed starting points, and one of these determinations is that time and eternity are not interchangeable terms, and that a time product can in no wise be translated, or transmuted, or transubstantiated into an eternal verity. Yet we have this passage from Mr. Wallace:—

"This world-life not only lends itself to the production, by gradual evolution, of the physical body needed for the growth and nourishment of the human soul, but by its very imperfections tends to the continuous development of the higher spiritual nature of man. In a perfect and harmonious world perfect beings might possibly have been created, but could hardly have been evolved, and it may well be that evolution is the great fundamental law of the universe of mind as well as of matter."

I believe I am not in error when I assume as a fundamental position of science this: that nothing essential or indestructible can ever be added to or taken from the universe. Now we all agree that through the processes of evolution something is added to the phenomenal universe, and we account for it by assuming that the type or idea as an eternal principle exists in essence, and all that evolution means is that the principle is clothed with materiality or otherwise brought to outward cognition. The strength of the evolutionary idea rests in this, that it admits of an illimitable background of real and eternal verities, and hence is the widest possible gateway through which to make excursions into a world of ideas. But this vantage ground, this highway to spiritual realities, Mr. Wallace not only ignores, but in effect cuts away, when he gives utterance to the purely materialistic thought that "it may well be that evolution is the great fundamental law of the universe of mind as well as of matter." So long as mind is conceived as merely a congeries of sensations, and the product of mind is assumed to be the ephemeral apprehension of external facts which we comprehend under the term knowledge, the evolution of mind is not only possible but an absolute necessity to thought. But when mind is conceived as an eternal principle (and nothing less than this can be predicated of it, if it be endowed with immortality) there can clearly be no talk of evolution. Even in this material world there can be no satisfactory, no complete understanding of evolution, except as it is conceived as working towards a definite reality—otherwise it is clearly a miracle. In some manner all forms must be eternal existences. Now mind is one of these eternal forms; and what distinguishes its form is consciousness; and it is nothing less than a materialistic vagary to hold or declare that consciousness, the one thing that constitutes mind, can be added to or subtracted from. That of which we have at any time been conscious, though outwardly forgotten, must for ever remain in consciousness, or it is eternally lost. Unless the soul is a conservator of consciousness by reason of its indestructibility, there can be no spiritual awakening in realms supernal. And consciousness in and of itself can be expressed only in terms of consciousness; whatever you may or may not be, the soul must ever know itself and all its belongings, and being immortal it can be conceived only as for ever in eternity. Mind may readily be conceived as the measure of the man, but to hold that the obverse of this proposition is also true, and that man is the measure of his mind, or spirit, or soul, is to give the entire case to the Materialist. For the Spiritualist nothing remains, not an iota. That matter discretely being in time—i.e., gives limitation to its consciousness—there is no denying; but to conceive that the outward product so established—a clear limitation, realising itself only under time and space conditions—shall be its form eternally, is an ontological conception so primitive that one may well ask in alarm if it is to this that Spiritualism is bringing us. Happily, the answer is far otherwise, and "the continued actual reception of teachings from it" (i.e., the world of souls), to which Mr. Wallace so confidently refers as destined to work mighty changes in the world, is gradually but surely, pushing forward into harmony with the thought that life is not an accident but an eternal verity, and that man is but a temporary expression of that which in its fullness is an eternal background. The soul does not exist for man's satisfaction, but man exists for the soul's satisfaction. This is the order of involution in contradistinction to the order of evolution, and when they are set over against each other as complementary processes, then not only have we a perfect whole, but a philosophy of eternity that brings the idea within human comprehension.

So much for the metaphysical aspect of the contention. Now a word or two bearing on its moral relation. Mr. Wallace writes:—

"Finally, these teachings of Modern Spiritualism furnish us with the much needed basis of a true ethical system. We learn by it that our earth-life is not only a preparation for a higher state of progressive spiritual existence, but that what we have usually considered as its very worst features, its all-pervading din and suffering, are in all probability the only means of developing in us those highest moral qualities summarised as 'love' by St. Paul, and 'altruism' by our modern teachers, which all admit must be cultivated to the utmost if we are really to make progress toward a higher social state. [Then follows an admirable dissertation on the utter inadequacy of modern philosophy as an incentive to duty, after which Mr. Wallace continues.] But when men are taught from childhood that the whole material universe exists for the very purpose of developing beings possessing these attributes, [demanded by altruism] that evil and pain, sin and suffering, all tend to the same end, and that the characters developed here will make further progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world, just in proportion as our higher moral feelings are cultivated here, and when all this can be taught, not as a set of dogmas to be blindly accepted on the authority of unknown ancient writers, but as being founded on direct knowledge of the spirit world, and the continued actual reception of teachings from it, then, indeed, we shall have in our midst 'a power that makes for righteousness.'"

Mr. Wallace here starts out with an admirable premise, that this earth-life is a school of preparation for higher outworkings, that suffering and sin are the real things that make for progress, and that the characters developed here will make further progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world; but when he adds as a necessary corollary that this progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world is in "proportion as our higher moral feelings are cultivated here," he not only slaps his premise (as to the office of sin and suffering) equally in the face, but destroys the entire ethical basis which he seeks to establish. From Mr. Wallace's position an ethical outworking is an utter impossibility. The ethical structure of Christianity is falling to pieces because it is not builded on the eternal principle of justice and equality, and Mr. Wallace's scheme labours under the same defect. If in consciousness of soul I choose a certain human expression, then the responsibility for existence rests with myself, and the principles of justice and equality are involved in the very idea of being. But if my existence is due to purely accidental conditions in matter, there is, to begin with, no element of responsibility involved in any existence that goes to myself; all responsibilities are thus either imposed upon me, or voluntarily assumed by me, as may happen; and there is, furthermore, an utter denial of the element of justice or equality. The Christian scheme, while it fails to throw any moral light on the inequalities visible here, at any rate throws open the door to perfect equality in Heaven, if you are inclined to accept the terms on which it is granted; but the Spiritualism of Mr. Wallace cuts away justice and equality to the very root. What we are, in so far as we are known to ourselves through present consciousness, is the product of forces over which we have little or no control. If my parents are wicked and dissolute there is small hope for my being anything else—and however much this oppressive order of nature may be necessary to the up-building of the race, it cannot be applied to the individual, unless it applies equally to all individuals. But we know it does not so apply—we know that the difference in natural endowments is enormous, and if it be true, as Mr. Wallace affirms, that our "progress toward a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world [is] just in proportion as our higher moral feelings are cultivated here," then the injustice, the cruelty, the discrimination, is doubly refined, and the order of the universe a hideous mockery of any conceivable Divine economy. Obviously then, we must look deeper than that which we know as discretely existence for the harmony of the differences which we observe all about us. If you answer that all will be equalised in the end, I have a right to ask for an explanation of the difference in the beginning. I am not now discussing physical existence, but moral existence—and yet between the two there must be an exact correspondence. Whatever I suffer must be a necessity to my being, and, inevitably, to avoid invidious distinctions, it must be in one form or another, necessary to all beings. Yet the infant dies without any experience whatsoever. And the good man dies without any of those experiences that come to the bad man, and, broadly speaking, the good man is good because he cannot help it, and with the bad man it is much the same as to badness. Obviously the inequalities we here observe must have their moral as well as their physical meaning, and whatever happens to any one must be a necessity to him in his divine nature. If, however, our beginnings are here, if spirit is evolved into discrete existence through matter, then obviously no moral necessity can by any possibility be predicated of the human differences that we know. Eternal life will not permit itself to be conceived under the form of chance, yet chance it is, if evolution be not complemented by involution, if whatever goes to human experience is not the inworking of the sovereign soul for its own satisfaction, and if a moral necessity does not inform and impel each act toward the goal of transfiguration.

BUENOS AYRES.—The president of the Spiritist Society, "Constantia," and editor of the journal of that name, has translated M. Bonnefont's Spiritist Catechism for the use of children, into Spanish, with notes.

PARIS.—A lecture against Spiritism has been delivered at the Salle des Capucines, by M. de Fonvielle, and I was one of his audience. He assumed it to be a mixture of imposture, credulity, and delusion, enlarging cleverly upon the condemnations against various mediums, not a few seated before him loudly protesting. He passed in silence the published testimony as to the alleged facts of Spiritism. In my simplicity, it seemed to me that M. de Fonvielle, as a savant, was not treating worthily a subject based upon facts; some of which have been vouched for by men like Victor Hugo, by journalists like Vacquerie and Meunier, by literary people like Madame de Girardin, and Ennery, and by men of science like Zöllner, Weber, and Crookes, whose testimony was that, after four years' study, he did not say "such things are possible—they are."—René Labrice, in the "Gutenberg Echo."

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

Dr. Wyld and the Hermetic Society.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Dr. Wyld's letter of the 4th inst. reads so much more like the product of a desire to "bring a railing accusation" against those who presume to differ from him, than of a desire to elucidate truth, that were I to follow my own impulse I should leave it unnoticed. As, however, there may be among your readers some who imagine, that because a charge is unanswered, it is therefore unanswerable, I will indicate, as briefly as possible, its chief fallacies.

In the first place, there are in the Hermetic Society no persons whom Dr. Wyld is entitled to call its "leaders," for the simple reason that the term "leaders" implies followers; and the members of the Hermetic Society are wholly unpledged and independent, and are not, therefore, followers of any persons whatever, but purely and simply of truth.

In the next place, Dr. Wyld has misrepresented the position of those whom he assails. We have neither "denied the historic Christ," nor that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," though we may differ from Dr. Wyld as to the sense to be ascribed to the latter expression.

Respecting this sense, it is necessary to remember that the fact that there was a difference of opinion in the Primitive Church—not whether Christ had come at all—but whether the manner of His coming had been such as to constitute the anticipated coming "in the flesh,"—shows that the phrase bore a meaning so subtle and occult as to be readily susceptible of misconception.

Had Christ indeed "come in the flesh" in the sense insisted on by Dr. Wyld, and been an altogether exceptional personage, miraculously engendered, a performer in public of numerous stupendous physical marvels, and so different in kind from other men as to be superhuman rather than a merely superior human, the fact would—we may well believe—have been so palpable and flagrant that no question could have arisen about it; and certainly it would not have been so depreciated by Paul. But so far from this being the case, there was a numerous party which held that Jesus was but an angelic or phantasmal appearance, unrelated to humanity, and that consequently no manifestation of Christ in and through humanity or "the flesh"—meaning thereby human beings—had occurred.

Dr. Wyld, however, not only assumes the right to be positive now about a matter concerning which there was doubt then, but takes a view which, as it seems to us, neither the Apostles nor their opponents held; and hastens to invoke anathema upon those whose respect for religious truth prompts them carefully to search the Scriptures for its real meaning and intention, instead of foisting upon it their own preferences and foregone conclusions. It is evidently but an ungracious reception that the promised "Spirit of Truth," when He comes, will receive at the hands of the Dr. Wylds of the period, in case he ventures to differ from them. As it is, it may well be that in refusing to accept the mode of coming I have suggested as a "coming in the flesh," Dr. Wyld incurs for himself the condemnation he seeks to pass upon us.

Even if we had made the denial ascribed to us by Dr. Wyld, the fault—if a fault at all—would, by his own showing, be a venial one, since he holds that "the historic Jesus, as a bare fact, may have very little influence on the souls of men," and that notwithstanding His "full possession and transmutation by the Divine Word," Jesus so slightly transcended the medium of the period that "a replica of almost every miracle attributed to Him may be found in modern Spiritualistic phenomena"! And, further, even if we had denied the "historic Jesus," we should not therein necessarily have affirmed that such Divine possession and transmutation had never occurred to any human being on this planet, seeing that similar experiences are ascribed in the Bible to two other persons, Enoch and Elijah; so that Dr. Wyld, when he cites the transmutation of Jesus as an unique event, shows himself to be as slenderly acquainted with the Old Testament as he obviously is with the New.

The very paper on which Dr. Wyld mainly bases his strictures admits the probability of there having been some special figure which served as chief model for the character delineated in the Gospels. We have denied only the proposition that there is in the Gospels anything that can, without an abuse of language, be called a history of such a person, or that is not true as mystically interpreted of every regenerate man.

As if despairing of proving his case by reasoning, Dr. Wyld betakes himself to assertion, and this in the most dogmatic fashion. "I assert," he says, "that there is not one discrepancy of importance in the four Gospels," but only "a few verbal discrepancies," and these such as to afford confirmation of their genuineness by showing that they were not fabrications. The hardihood of this utterance, extreme as it is, is not its only objectionable feature. As a direct unqualified contradiction of us it is also discourteous. There are plenty of ways of expressing dissent from an opponent without plainly implying that one considers him so unworthy of heed as to be best met by a flat contradiction. The presumption of it, too, is amusing, or, at least, would be so but for the melancholy proof it affords of the utter failure of its utterer to have followed the developments of modern research in these grave matters. Dr. Wyld evidently supposes that he will have settled the question to his satisfaction when he has succeeded in discrediting us; whereas he has, on the contrary, to deal with the vast array of competent and candid scholars who in the last half century have devoted themselves to the inquiry, with the result of demonstrating absolutely the hopeless discordance of the Gospels, both with each other and with contemporary history, and the large extent to which they are reproductions of legends, and compilations from literatures long pre-existent; and, consequently, their non-historical character. These are results irrefragably established for all who have carefully and candidly examined the grounds on which they rest. And yet they are to be disposed of by the simple ipse dixit of one who is so much of a tyro in the subject that little over three years ago, in a discussion upon it, he expressed surprise at learning, among other discrepancies—all of which have sorely exercised the orthodox—that the Gospels disagree as to the day of the Crucifixion! As he had taken their agreement in this and other respects for granted, then, so now. For his letter shows that he has not improved the interval by acquiring further knowledge of the subject.

To cite but a few of the contradictions to which a belief in the Gospels as historical and concordant commits its holder. He must believe both that Jesus was miraculously born of a virgin mother and the Holy Ghost, and was not derived from the house of David; and also that He was born naturally of Joseph and Mary, since only through Joseph could He have been "of the seed of David according to the flesh." He must believe both that Jesus did go down into Egypt, His parents having fled thither on the night following the visit of the Magi, in order to escape the massacre ordered by Herod; and also that He did not go into Egypt, but remained where He was born to be circumcised after eight days, and, after forty days, to accompany His parents to Jerusalem for His mother's purification, a visit which was repeated every successive year for twelve years, and consequently that there was no persecution or massacre by Herod. He must believe both that the mother of Jesus was so fully aware of His Divine nature and mission as to treasure in her heart every incident concerning Him; and also that she failed wholly to comprehend His allusions to His peculiar nature and destiny, and joined His brethren in an attempt to withdraw Him from a public career on the ground of madness. He must believe that Jesus was crucified both on the day of the Passover, and again on the day after the Passover; that the resurrection occurred under four different and incompatible sets of circumstances, a different set being detailed and positively stated in each Gospel; that the ascension occurred both, as described in the Gospel of Luke, on the same day as the resurrection, and also as stated in the Acts, which purports also to be Luke's, forty days after the resurrection; and that Judas both returned the money paid for his treachery and hanged himself, and also did not return the money but bought a field with it, and died therein of an accident. It is, of course, open to Dr. Wyld to plead that the parentage, birth, crucifixion, and ascension are not matters of importance, and I am quite willing to allow him this loophole for escape. But he cannot avail himself of this plea and still retain his belief in the historical character of the documents which thus differ respecting them, seeing that they, not to mention the system founded on them, treat them as of the utmost importance, and that, if not historical on these points, they are not entitled to be regarded as historical at all; but, if of serious import, must be regarded as we regard them, namely, as mystical.

As for the pretended doubts about Napoleon, Dr. Wyld forgets that there remains a very substantial residuum of indubitable fact in his case, while in that of Jesus there remains nothing after the doubtful parts are eliminated.

Had Dr. Wyld really desired to promote knowledge he would not have omitted to notice the striking demonstration given by me of the fact that so far from Jesus being represented as claiming for Himself an exceptional physical birth, He is represented as disclaiming anything of the kind, inasmuch as He is made to declare it necessary to every man that he be born again precisely as He Himself is described as having been born, namely, spiritually;—"Water and the Spirit," and "Virgin Mary and the Holy Ghost," being but symbolical formulas for the soul and spirit of which man when regenerate is "born again." But Dr. Wyld passes over this conclusive proof that the subject of the Gospels is really not a particular human personality, but the interior and spiritual personality of every regenerate man; and, as if under the impression that an assertion needs only to be repeated often enough to convert it into a fact, he proceeds to reiterate his disbelief in the doctrine of physical rebirths or "re-incarnation."

His remarks here are no less open to objection for their superficiality, their flippancy, and even their insincerity. The negative experience of a majority, however large, proves—as Dr. Wyld well knows—nothing as against the positive experience of a minority, however small. Nevertheless, he cites the non-experience of the majority as an argument against the doctrine. The reminiscence of past existences belongs, not to the spiritualistic, but to the spiritual, consciousness, and to an interior region of this; and it is therefore not comprisable in the order of experiences of which alone, as I am forced to conclude, Dr. Wyld has cognisance. Of the profound philosophy of the doctrine, and of the sanctity of the experiences on which it rests, he is obviously unaware, or he would not make contemptuous reference to the latter as by ascribing them to a process of "self-biologising." The reply of Jesus to His disciples concerning this doctrine, though it evaded the question, neither was scornful nor denied it.

Limited to a single earth-life, the experiences requisite to enable a "Captain of Salvation" to be "made perfect through suffering," would indeed be few!

Equally fallacious is his demand for "scientific proof" of the facts of the spiritual consciousness. As if the reality of a remote memory of any kind was capable of sensible demonstration! While his denial of there being any historic confirmation of the doctrine seems to imply that Plato, Pythagoras and Buddha are names as strange to him as those of Enoch and Elijah appear to be. As a student of such subjects he ought to know that the whole of the ancient religions comprised the doctrine of transmigration, and consequently of re-incarnation. But there are students and students, and Dr. Wyld's letter makes it difficult to class him with those who merit to be called serious.

One remark on what Dr. Wyld so warmly eulogises as the "testimony" of Mr. Roden Noel. The argument from the alleged necessity of a realised ideal of perfection in another as an aid to the pursuit of it in oneself, if valid at all, must be valid in cases other than that where the perfection in question is spiritual. Is it the fact that the belief in the existence of some transcendently physically-beautiful specimen of humanity is necessary to enable us either to aspire after physical beauty in ourselves or to form a conception of perfect beauty for ourselves? Assuredly not. We none the less recognise and desire beauty because we know of no one perfectly beautiful. And the artist is none the less able to devise a perfect type because he cannot find a perfect model. For all that is necessary for him is to have suitable subjects from which to compile the manifold excellencies he desires to combine into a single image. Greek art was a new revelation of the beauty of the human form. Yet it needed not that any one individual be transcendently beautiful; or even that there be more beauty than usual in the world; but only that there be an enhanced perception of beauty. Why may it not have been so with the inspired artists to whom the world owes the portraits of its Christs? It is none the less a "coming of Christ in the flesh" that His lineaments be distributed among many. But Dr. Wyld sides with those who say "Lo, here is Christ, or lo, there!"

Regretting the length at which I have been compelled to write, and trusting that any reply that may be made will in some degree tend to edification,—I am, &c.,

EDWARD MAITLAND.

The Historic Jesus.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Mrs. Kingsford writes that "she does not think Mr. Roden Noel and the 'leaders' of the Hermetic Society are so much in disagreement as Dr. Wyld seems to think": namely, on the question of the historic Jesus.

All that I say is, that Mr. Roden Noel and myself are in exact agreement on this matter, and in disagreement with the views expressed by the leaders of the Hermetic Society; for while I and others most entirely believe that Jesus Christ was not only an historic Person, but the most important historic Person this planet has known, Mrs. Kingsford, on the contrary, if she "has never denied the historic Jesus," yet says, "It does not matter to me whether the Gospels are true or not on the merely outer plane."

I cannot understand Mrs. Kingsford when she says, "No man can know any fact, and therefore cannot set it down; and I am quite sure there is virtually no such thing as history."

These are remarkable statements, and I would ask; Is it not a fact that $2 \times 2 = 4$, and can I not set it down? Are these not three facts, that food generally satisfies hunger, water quenches thirst, and fire warms? Is it not a fact that Mrs. Kingsford is president of the Hermetic Society, and that the president not only doubts the historic Jesus, but asserts that "No man can know any fact, and that there is no such thing as history"; and when her biography comes to be written will those facts in her belief not be set down and accepted as historic?

Mrs. Kingsford further says:—"I shall be glad to receive any really logical and scholarly rectification and explanation of the many serious and important misstatements and inconsistencies undoubtedly existing in the Gospels. These difficulties do not concern mere details but the facts of the life itself."

That there are minute and verbal variations in the Gospels I have already admitted, but I deny that these in any "serious" degree affect the grandeur and verisimilitude of the historic portrait, and I would ask the editor of "LIGHT" to permit Mrs. Kingsford to substantiate her statements in this respect.

True, the Innocents may not have been massacred, and certain taxes may not have been levied at a stated time, but if so, those details would no more detract from the grand truths of the historic representation, than similar historic inaccuracies would weaken our belief in the historic Cromwell or Washington.

My critic asks, "Does not Dr. Wyld see that he proves too much in proving the modern phenomena of Spiritualism to be identical with 'the mighty works' of Jesus?"

In reply, I say that I never thought or attempted to prove any such thing. I only said that the Agnostic who disbelieved in miracles has an excuse for regarding the miraculous life of Jesus as mythical; but that those who, like Mrs. Kingsford, believe in the phenomena of Spiritualism have no such excuse. I used the word replica as signifying a copy, so far by the same hand, in so far as it was spiritual; but the value of that copy is very small as compared with the original, and there is no identity between phenomena performed by earth-bound spirits and the mighty works of Jesus, which came from the fountain of the All Spirit, through the highest Incarnation of the Divine; and I marvel that one who so ardently teaches the grand mystic doctrine of the possibility of the Incarnation of the Christ in Man, should yet doubt or deny that this sublime idea, in its completeness, became a unique fact in the person of the historic Jesus.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

Inspirational Speaking.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—For some years past the attention of Spiritualists in London appears to have been devoted mainly to the investigation of phenomenal evidences.

There must certainly be a large number whose experiences in this direction have been conclusive, and who have been convinced that such phenomena are the result of action by unseen intelligences, exerted with the direct intention of producing an educational effect on the minds of the human witnesses.

Such experiences must create a desire to learn something about these unseen operators, and the forces with which they work.

We have at present, in our midst, an instrument used by the unseen intelligences for imparting such information, the subject being hypnotised by the invisible operators, and in the trance state used to give expression to their will.

The trance state is, of course, well known to Spiritualists, who, in many instances, have witnessed this condition in members of their own families. It is unnecessary, therefore, to insist here on this phenomenon being bond fide. The instrument we refer to, Mrs. Richmond, is well known, as is also the important work performed by her in the past. Many Spiritualists will remember the meetings held in St. George's Hall in 1873, at which large crowds attended to hear her discourses, which were favourably criticised in the Daily News, Morning Post, &c., &c.

Has not the time again come round when support will be given to expositions concerning the Cause World and its laws?

Inquiry is the very spirit of the age in which we live. On all sides we see men bending in earnest endeavour to get at the truth of things; to sift and weigh; to discover the true value of all things, whatever may be the authority with which they may have been invested in the past, and in spite of the cost of such procedure, and the pain which the possible overthrow of cherished idols may entail.

Is this, then, not a time when men already satisfied by previous experience as to the source of the information to which they may be addressing themselves, shall come forward to "ask and question" concerning the unseen forces of the Cause World? We have the voice of the oracle among us. Are we to turn aside, and prefer to give ear to the discussions of the scribes in the temples?

The committee who are giving their support to the work being carried out by the intelligences who use Mrs. Richmond as their instrument would be glad to receive the names of any friends who may be willing to assist in furthering that work.

Letters to be addressed to Mrs. Richmond's Committee, care of Mrs. Strawbridge, 11, Blandford-square.

Yours faithfully,

"INSPIRATION."

Concert at Cavendish Rooms.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The Cavendish Rooms Sunday Services have been so useful and successful in many ways, that I feel sure no apology is needed to introduce their claim to the attention of London Spiritualists. As they are conducted on a purely voluntary and self-supporting basis, there being no subscribers nor holders of paid seats, it is necessary to have a social gathering about this time, to secure funds to continue the meetings during the coming winter; and, in addition, to bring the friends together in a social manner, which is to a great extent the strength of a public movement. With these objects in view, I have pleasure in stating that Cavendish Rooms have been secured for a concert, to take place on Wednesday, August 12th, and a very excellent programme is in preparation. The tickets will be: reserved seats, 2s.; admission, 1s. That the funds may benefit as fully as possible, I am desirous of receiving subscriptions towards the expenses, in which good and necessary work a beginning has already been made. Friends in various parts of London will greatly oblige by applying for tickets on sale; and our well-wishers will assist very much by purchasing tickets, and if they can favour us with their presence they will receive a cordial welcome.—I remain,

CAVENDISH ROOMS, MORTIMER-STREET, CAVENDISH-SQUARE, W.—On Sunday, July 19th, at 11 a.m., in the evening 7 p.m. In the morning Mr. W. J. Colville will speak on "The Seven-fold Nature of Man." In the evening on "The Bible of God and the Bibles of Men."

FAREWELL VISIT OF MR. J. J. MORSE TO NORTHUMBERLAND.—It is announced that Mr. Morse will pay the following farewell visits:—Sedgehill (Schools), on Saturday, July 18th, when he will lecture at 6.45 p.m. Newcastle (Weir's Court Hall), on Sunday, July 19th, at 10.30 a.m. and 6.30 p.m.; and on Monday, July 20th, at 7.30 p.m. North Shields (Society's Rooms, Camden-street), on Tuesday and Wednesday, July 21st and 22nd, at 7.45 p.m. On Thursday, July 23rd, the visit will terminate with a farewell tea and social gathering at Weir's Court Hall, Newcastle, under the combined auspices of the local societies. In the course of the evening a testimonial will be presented to Mr. Morse, in acknowledgment of his untiring zeal and devotion to the Spiritual movement during a long period of years, and the very able advocacy of our cause by his "guides."

"FACTS ARE CHIEFS THAT WINNA DING."

Recent experiments with what are designated "homing pigeons" have fully confirmed the fact that the birds will fly, with great speed and the utmost precision, distances of hundreds of miles, and reach their respective homes after flying many hours at the average rate of forty miles per hour. The how of this marvellous feat is unknown, but the fact is undeniable.

Living organisms as small as flies or gnats are incomprehensible to the most learned; their mechanisms are as perfect in their degree as are those of man, but the complexity of the mechanism, associated with their minuteness, would, if the phenomena were not daily visible, be inconceivably marvellous; only less marvellous than are monads and bacteria, the length and width of whose bodies are the thirty-thousandth of an inch, and the vibratile flagellæ by which they swim being less than the two-hundred thousandth of an inch in diameter, and yet these almost invisible threads possess great vital activity. Careful observation alone will gradually reveal the marvellous mysteries of nature, and no alleged phenomena, however improbable, if testified to by many credible and capable witnesses, should be contemptuously rejected under the supposition that such phenomena are contrary to natural laws and of impossible occurrence.

All the common phenomena of nature, apart from experience and logical inference, would be thought impossible. Take for example gravitation, a property of all substances, and the influence of which, as far as is known, is instantaneous in its action at any distance, or, at least, if not instantaneous, its speed has never been calculated, as have been the speeds of light and electricity; a force not exhausted by incalculable space, which acts as certainly on objects a billion of miles apart as one mile; an energy that cannot by any means be intercepted either by vacuum or solid; that holds every atom in the universe in its relentless grasp, a dewdrop being equally under its control as a nebulous cluster containing millions of suns and systems.

Take light, travelling by undulation only, and not by progression, through a hypothetical boundless ether—this is unexhausted by distance, and is a form of force without being an entity; is produced by vibrations in a hypothetical something, the existence of which is only the necessity of theory. Luminiferous ether is theoretically denser than a diamond, and millions of times more elastic than steel, and yet offers not a phantom of resistance to the faintest and most attenuated gas.

These and myriads of other theories of science, are generally accepted by the learned as the most satisfactory modes of explaining every-day phenomena, and yet there are scientific men who refuse to observe facts that can be made as palpable as that two and two make four, or that the moon is seen by the reflected light of the sun.

The latest, or rather the supposed latest triumph of science is photographing the invisible. Objects too faint to produce visual impressions on the human retina, leave distinct impressions on the sensitized dry plate, and gelatine and silver accomplish more than the most sensitive human eye. The practised eye of the astronomer, aided by the highest telescopic powers, observes millions of stars that are invisible to unaided vision, but a mechanically-arranged telescope, with a sensitized photographic plate as a retina, registers the existence of myriads more, too far removed from earth to produce visual impressions on the most sensitive human eye, aided by the most powerful optical instruments.

All this is very interesting, very wonderful, and possibly very true, but other facts probably more interesting, wonderful, true, and important, are turned from with open or ill-concealed disdain—more important because the former have special relation to physical and biological laws of terrestrial importance, whilst the latter not merely refer to the phenomena of this life, but point to a future sphere of existence of which this is but the transitory preliminary stage.

If the alleged phenomena of Modern Spiritualism be true, they appeal to precisely the same kinds of evidence as those by which ordinary mundane facts are established, and their solution is more important because they foreshadow, if they do not prove, a condition of existence the outcome of the present, and possibly, though not demonstrably, of limitless duration.

If psychography, which may be observed in the full blaze of daylight, and in any apartment, be genuine—and thousands of honest, credible, and competent witnesses affirm that it is so—why do not the leaders of scientific research, the men who profess to seek truth for truth's sake, carefully and courageously examine the phenomena, which may be had under conditions that render imposture impossible?

MR. W. EGLINTON leaves London on the 28th inst. for Lincolnshire, for a period of four or five weeks.

We are in a position to state that Mr. W. Eglinton has been offered a Government appointment on the Gold Coast, by a prominent member of the present Administration, but that he has declined it on account of the deadly climate.

BOOKS RECEIVED FOR REVIEW.—We have been unable as yet to read and notice several works which have reached us lately. We hope to do so in the course of a week or two. Amongst these may be named: "Whisperings: Poems"; "The Divine Love and Wisdom"; "Beyond the Valley," a sequel to "The Magic Staff," by Andrew Jackson Davis; "Karma," a novel in two volumes; "Transactions of the London Lodge of the Theosophical Society," Nos. 4, 5, and 6; "The Virgin of the World."

MRS. CORA L.V. RICHMOND'S DISCOURSES.—The last address of the present series was delivered at Kensington Town Hall, on Sunday evening last, to a full audience, on the subject of "The Final Religion of the Earth." It was announced that the committee had arranged for a resumption of the series on the 20th September next, at the Kensington Assembly Rooms, the Town Hall unfortunately not being available. The length of the new series will be regulated by the amount of support received. Offers of assistance to be forwarded by letter to Mrs. Strawbridge, No. 11, Blandford-square, N.W.

THE CAMBERWELL AND PECKHAM ASSOCIATION OF INQUIRERS INTO SPIRITUALISM, of 81, Well-street, Camberwell, held their first Sunday evening meeting on July 5th, when an eloquent address was delivered by Miss Keeses, and listened to with great interest, after which several questions were put, and very satisfactorily answered. It is intended to continue these meetings on the first Sunday in each month, notice of which will be given in due course. The Thursday evening circle being now complete another is being organised to meet on Tuesdays at 8.30 p.m. Any friends wishing to join will oblige by communicating with the secretary.

REVIEW.

SHADOWS: OR, MR. JOHN WETHERBEE'S EXPERIENCES OF AND THOUGHTS ON SPIRITUALISM.*

"I am sure," says Mr. Wetherbee (and when he says that he means it), "there is a power, impulse, or force in nature not recognised as yet by science, or as something outside of the recognised domain of science. The best extoteric definition of it is Psychic Force. This power or force is certainly intelligent, even if ultra-human. It claims to be a force from 'over the river,' from departed spirits; it claims to be from the loved and lost, from those whose bodies are mouldering in the grave, assuring us mortals that they still live. This intelligent 'psychic force' has never claimed to be anything else but a departed human being, in a single instance, from the first manifestation in 1848 to the present time."

It will be gathered that Mr. Wetherbee occupies the same platform as myself. He is a Spiritualist "hard shell," as he might perhaps say. Readers of the Banner of Light are used to the quaint, wise remarks which he contributes from time to time to that journal. They have in this book something that they are used to, and a collection of opinion which is more ready to the hand than a mass of newspaper articles.

Mr. Wetherbee's own account of the way in which he became a Spiritualist is as instructive as anything contained in his book. Death had removed from his family a little girl of six years old. Mr. Wetherbee, at that time, was a Materialist; Mrs. Wetherbee had been brought into contact with some Spiritualists, and was urged to assuage her grief by endeavouring to open relations with her lost child through a medium. She did so, and her account of what took place did not impress her husband, "It seemed silly business," he said, "and made no impression on me: but I saw no harm in it, as it occupied her mind and gave her something to think of."

It chanced one afternoon, as Mrs. Wetherbee was going out for a walk, that she met her sister on the steps just coming to see her. The ladies agreed to go to a medium, a Mrs. Leeds, of whom Mrs. Wetherbee had incidentally heard. "On reaching the house in Carver-street, they found that Mrs. Leeds was absent on a visit to Judge Edmunds in New York." They were turning to go when they asked the girl who had opened the door if she knew any good medium. "She gave them the address of Mrs. Hayden, of Hayward-place, and the ladies went directly there."

Mr. Wetherbee knew nothing of all this, and this makes his narrative very striking. I continue it in his own precise words.

I was in my library up stairs, and alone. I had some writing to do, but the subject of spiritual manifestations was for the moment occupying my mind, and in their connection with my wife, who had just gone out, as I have described, and I began to cogitate. I said to myself, ought I not to look into this matter, and why is it necessary to go to a stranger to get a message from any of my departed friends? That has, thought I, an unreasonable look to begin with. I had forgotten, or it did not occur to me, that King Saul, when in grief and sore distressed, had to go in that way to the woman of Endor before he could connect himself with or get a message from his departed friend Samuel. In beginning this cogitation, it rather appeared to me that if my little daughter was alive, though invisible, or any spirit of my loved and lost relatives or friends had any message for me, here and now was the time and place for the manifestations. Here in this room is the old table, and on it the old Bible, printed in 1751, that old familiar faces of my youth sat at and turned the leaves of the book, and showed and explained the pictures in it, and I began to grow sentimental with the pleasures of memory. I seemed to grow hospitable to the idea, or rather to the images of these old faces that were as vivid, in my mind, as the old book was that had outlasted them to my senses. I believed everything was subject to law, and that it was possible that the room was then full of spirits though my intellect was infidel to the idea; still in my heart there arose a sacred voice which said it was a possible thing. Perhaps there is something wanting which I have not got, thought I, which, if I had, or was in the right condition, these old familiar faces, or some of them, might issue out of the silent air, or in some way manifest or reach me. Some remembrances of family love, that need not be mentioned now, but may be before this book is ended, had some effect upon me, and I began to dwell on it in my imagination,—build castles in the air, as some call it,—I did alone what I would have been ashamed to have done in any company. I said to the circumambient vacant air vocally, if there are any beings present who can hear me (thinking then of my child, Hattie, and my sister), I wish you would be present when my wife attends any of these sittings, and will you send me a message? and remembering I had had messages now and then,—love-sending or remembrances which had no convincing character to them, and what anyone could say, and not be out of the way; so I said, send me this message,—which I then repeated. I will not repeat here the message I asked for; it was characteristic of me, and was religiously asked for, but it might be construed humorously, and in the connection seem frivolous, for though I am constitutionally light-hearted and cheerful, I have a very pensive undertone, and on this subject whatever may be my manner, I am at heart always serious.

It occurred to me, also, that spirits might see and not hear, and, having a pen before me, I wrote the message as well as spoke it, and folded up the paper on which it was written, and put it into my desk, where no one could see or get it. I certainly did not expect any response. I did not ask for it with any faith. I do not know as if I ever would have thought of it again, except that the subject, in its connection with my wife, was often in my mind, and this trifling circumstance would, therefore, not have been forgotten. I, however, had the feeling that I would give all I had in the world if there had been any foundation of truth in this matter, which, however, did not seem to me at all probable or possible.

I did not know, as I have already said, where my wife had gone. What I have said, thought, and done alone in my library was known only to myself. Late in the afternoon I went out, and on my return at tea-time, the first thing my wife said to me was: "There is a message for you from Hattie," handing me a small, rolled-up strip of paper, she looking at me, all alive with expectation, for she knew, under any circumstances, the message would please me, as a definitely characteristic one, of or for me. I unrolled, read it, and found a long string of letters not divided into words, but it was the message exactly, when divided off into words, that I had asked for a few hours before.

The sitting at Mrs. Hayden's is thus described:—

These ladies, when they reached the medium's house in Hayward-place, found there the lady, and stated what they had come for, and were invited to sit down at the table used for the purpose of spirit communications, the medium sitting at it also. The sister held the pencil,—she had been requested to by my wife before entering, to see if it made any difference. Raps were at once heard, the spirits answering yes and no to questions. Soon the alphabet was used, and as the letter wanted was reached a rap was heard, and thus some singular but very true messages were given intelligently in this way, but they need not be recorded here. After a little while the letters of a message read: "Hattie is here." My wife said: "I am glad you have come; have you anything to say to your father?"—and three raps indicated "Yes." The alphabet was then used, and the letters noted down as the raps signified the right one; and, when finished, it was a string of letters, as I have said, not divided into words, but which were easily read, particularly by my wife, who saw that it was somewhat characteristic, and knew it would please me, and perhaps be a test. She did not know until she had got home and given it to me, and I had told her the facts, that I had asked the spirits to send the message, and the string of letters written down in that way,—the letter wanted being rapped at when it was reached,—and in their whole-ness was the message I had asked for in the manner stated.

Mr. Wetherbee was, naturally, impressed by this experience, and under the assumed name of Johnson went off to see what he could get for himself. He thus narrates what took place:—

I came to this medium's house under the assumed name of Johnson, and hearing the raps was told they were the spirits, and that I could ask them any questions. I began by asking the invisibles if they knew me, and the reply being "Yes," I said: "What is my name?" and the answer was, "John Wetherbee." I was both surprised and interested, for, as I have said, I was entirely unknown to the medium, and though she sat very near the table, I could see she did not touch it, and if she had, under all the circumstances, it would have made no difference. I then asked: "Will you tell me who you are?" And the raps spelled the name of "Susan Gibson."

I was expecting it would have been Adeline, Hattie, or some other near spirit, and I did not know any Susan Gibson; and hoping to bring her to mind, among other questions, I said: "Where did you die?" The reply was: "Providence." That fact did not help any, but was interesting, as I had relatives in that city, and had visited it a great deal. I then asked: "When did you die?" And the reply was: "About nine years ago." This was interesting, for my sister was living there; had been married a year or more before that time. My unmarried sister was a guest of hers much of the time, and for the year or two prior to the nine years mentioned by the spirit, I was there near half of my time, and so I concluded that Susan Gibson might have been some person that I had met there that I had forgotten, though it seems she had not forgotten me. I then asked the spirit: "Do you know my sister?" The reply was: "Yes." "What is her name?" And the letters in reply rapped out were, E. L. I. Noticing them thus, I thought to myself, she is mistaken; it is going to be Eliza or Elizabeth, and have no sister by that name. I said nothing, and the next letter was an O, then a T, and the rapping stopped. At first, I did not recognise it, but as quickly as I saw it read, Eliot, then I saw it was my sister's name, Elliott. The spirit had spelled the name in the usual way, but our Elliotts spelled it with two I's and two T's, and in the diminished form I at first did not recognise it. It was far better in the way manifested, for it showed the spirit was not getting it from my mind. I then saw that that was the name of my living sister; but I wanted the name of my dead one, or who was now a spirit, and the reply was "Adeline," which was correct.

Speaking of this to my sister in Providence, I found her no better off than I was; she could remember no Susan Gibson among her acquaintances, but in the early part of her married life—say ten or eleven years before this interview—she had a domestic living with her by the name of Susan; it might have been Susan Gibson, but she did not know whether it was or not. As the communication was so correct, even free from any mind-reading, it seems to me reasonable to suppose it was the Susan that was the domestic. Imagine the situation, and see how natural it is, on that basis. She was the family-servant of Mrs. Elliott, my sister visiting her, whose name was Adeline, and I was often there. I asked her, as a spirit, for my sister's name. I was thinking of Adeline, who was a spirit, but the spirit of the domestic said "Eliot," speaking of her mistress by the name she was known, and then of Adeline, as she would have been known in that household.

It seems to me that this case is good and sufficient to carry the superstructure that Mr. Wetherbee built upon it. It made a Spiritualist of him, and he has remained one ever since.

Our author was intimately acquainted with my friend Epes Sargent, and has some good narratives of experiences with him. Here is one with the medium Colchester, a name well-known in the earlier days of Spiritualism.

We were seated around a table at the pleasant home of Daniel Farrar, of Hancock-street, Boston. The table was about four feet by two, square. There were six persons making this circle, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Farrar, Mrs. Wetherbee, Epes Sargent, myself, and Colchester,—two on each of the long sides, and one each on the ends. I had an end seat, and the back of my chair was against the bureau that was on the side of the room, and Sargent was my vis-à-vis. We were having a very satisfactory time, with a variety of manifestations, and the circle was a remarkably good one.

Colchester said to me: "Take a few of those plain white cards" (they were on the table for the purpose) "and put them in one of the drawers back of you, marking them first so as to know them again." I did so, cutting a crooked piece out of the corner of each, and retaining them for the purpose. There were six in number of the cards that I took and put in the drawer. "Now, take a handful of those crayons," said he, "and throw them in, and shut the drawer." It may be well to say that the drawer was quite full of white, folded cotton materials, leaving no spare room, so that the cards and pencils were in tolerably close quarters.

We proceeded then with the manifestations as before, and in perhaps about half an hour, in which we had other manifestations, Mr. Colchester said to me: "Better now open the drawer, and see how the cards look." I got up, and had to, as before, in order to move my chair so as to open the drawer, and took out what were once the six clean white cards, and found a picture, artistically drawn on each of them,—flowers, fruit, landscapes, birds, &c.,—and the colours used in the pictures thus drawn were the colours of the crayons or pencils that were put in the bureau drawer. Those crayons that we left on the table were not expressed in the pictures. I hardly need to say that this was done in a brightly-lighted room, and nobody had any access to the drawer, and could not if they had desired to, as I was sitting so closely to it, and had to move my chair before I could open it.

One more piece of evidence—this time bearing on the question of spirit-identity—is all that space permits. J. S. Thrasher, a close friend of Mr. Wetherbee's, was known to him, and jokingly addressed in correspondence as "the Sage of Galveston." He rejoined by beginning his letter, "My Dear Philosopher." He was a man of wide experience, and had been for many years on the staff of the New York Herald, when he passed on to the next state. A large correspondence had taken place between these two friends. "He signed his name on his two or three hundred letters as J. S. Thrasher." The I was unmistakable, quite identical with that which represented the pronoun of the first person, quite different from the J in the address of the letter to John Wetherbee. This is important to a full appreciation of the evidence.

Mr. Wetherbee had gone (in the year 1881) to Miss Shelhamer's home circle, and after receiving some messages from other spirits, there occurred what I will again allow Mr. Wetherbee to relate in his own way.

The control afterwards said, addressing me: "There is a spirit who comes to you and wants to be recognised; he died a good way off and many months ago." I said: "Who is he? what is his name?" "I will see if I can get it," said the control; and after some hesitation said something that sounded like Frasher, and John or James; but as I knew no James, and no Frasher, I said: "Cannot some of my spirit friends tell me his name?"

The spirit said he had tried hard to manifest, and had promised me that he would, and the control said he seemed disappointed and persevering. I said: "Tell the spirit to come to the Banner circle, and try to manifest there"; and the control said he would if he could. A little while after this, "Lotela" controlled the medium. She is an Indian spirit of a lively turn of mind, and she said: "Wetherbee chief, that spirit that knows you is here still, and wants to be recognised." I said I wanted the recognition as much as he did, and I was sorry I was so stupid. She then said: "I see four large letters right over him and you—S-A-G-E." "Oh," said I, "the 'Sage of Galveston,' my friend Thrasher. He died some months ago, and promised to manifest to me when he went over, if he could."

The spirit was delighted to be thus recognised, and I still more so,—for it was so impossible for our acquaintance to have been known by the medium, and the cognomen of "Sage" was wholly correspondent and private. This was an extremely interesting affair to me; but the climax was the message that came from him shortly after at the Banner circle.

I went to the circle. I do not go often; have not the time; was detained down town one afternoon to meet a friend late, and so went to the circle to pass the time, and the message published in the last Banner of Light was given. Very few people—not more than one or two—in this city knew Mr. Thrasher, or of our close correspondent relations, and I do not believe a living soul in the world knows that he was in the habit of addressing me as "My Dear Philosopher," and that makes it a test. He refers to me, as will be seen by his message, as his friend and philosopher, and I can show over two hundred letters from him, beginning, "My Dear Philosopher," or referring to me as his philosopher and friend, which is a feature in that message. The general contents, also, are such as to be unmistakably his to anyone who knew the tenor of our intercourse. Above and beyond this internal evidence is what I shall hereafter say of his message which frees the communication from any suspicion of mind-reading on the part of the spirit that would have made him, possibly, an alias.

Oh, how my heart died within me when he closed the message thus: "You may say it is from J. S. Thrasher, of Galveston, Texas, to his philosopher friend, John Wetherbee, of Boston." The J broke my heart. Everything else was perfect. I don't know what I would have given to have had that spoken an I, in giving his name, instead of a J. I felt and knew it came from my Galveston friend, but why spirits so often get twisted on some trifle that the man himself never would mistake if he were in the form, but a spirit often does, is one of the unaccountables.

There was no mistaking the message and the circumstances as being from my friend, the "Sage," but the J coming, instead of an I, led me into a careful investigation, and I spent three evenings carefully reading his letters, and, to my great joy, I found two of them out of the lot signed with a J. That settled all the other I's to be J's, and in one letter, where he was quoting something of mine, and putting his own version also, he put at the end of mine as author, J. W., and at the end of his J. S. T. Before I had discovered the fact, I wrote South to a friend for information, and have received a reply that his initial letter was J., as his friend writes me in reply to mine, that his name was John S. Thrasher. So it seems the spirit was right, and I was wrong. If, on the evening that I spent at Miss Shelhamer's circle, I had known this—that his initial letter was a J—I would probably have made my connection with him more readily; and when the spirit was saying John and James, and approximating to a Thrasher by saying Frasher, I would not have had to wait for the "Sage" suggestion before I recognised him; but in the end it was all for the best.

There is much in this volume of the highest interest to Spiritualists; careful narratives such as I have quoted; wise reflections quaintly phrased; bits of philosophical pondering and speculation very provocative of thought. The contents of the book are of varied, and perhaps unequal value; but almost every taste will find something of fact, philosophy, or exhortation to satisfy it. Its highest recommendation is, to my mind, the transparent sincerity of the author, and his even garrulous explanation of his own mental states, and of the effect made upon him at various times by the phenomena which he witnessed. I trust the book may be widely read in this country. It is sure to be welcomed in America.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXVI.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Whitehall Review for July 2nd, quotes in its entirety the article from our columns, "on the recovery of lost property by spirit agency," and the "intelligent" criticisms of the editor of that journal will be read by the readers of "LIGHT" with much interest.

He says: "We have so often described miracles of this kind that we do not now purpose going into the conjuring tricks, which would readily account for such remarkable phenomena. All we wish to say is, that we are very suspicious about this slate business. We cannot, try as we will, make out what connection there is between a slate, a slate pencil, and an inhabitant of the unseen world. We should like to have the adventures of the Irish halfpenny carried on by a frying-pan rather than with a slate. When the spirits can do with a frying-pan or a toast-rack what they can do with a slate, we shall then believe in them. Until then, however, we shall be irreverent enough to consider Spiritualism to be a modern word for humbug. May we suggest—upon the hypothesis that our impertinent want of faith is erroneous and unwarranted—that the authorities at Scotland Yard should engage a few Spiritualistic mediums as detectives?"

When this brilliant editor's doubts have been satisfied by the employment of countless frying-pans, and the sensible suggestion has taken root among all classes of Spiritualists, I shall watch with interest all that may be said by the sceptical world of the "latest craze" of a believer. We are indebted to the Press for much, but we have special reason to be proud that the editor of "a journal of politics, literature, art, and country pursuits," circulating, we presume, among the educated classes, should have the inventive genius to suggest the use of frying-pans instead of the ordinary writing-paper of commerce.

Since writing the above another issue of the Whitehall Review has appeared, and "One Who Knows the Truth" writes as follows to the editor: "I have just seen a copy of a recent issue of your paper, and I much regret to find that you sneer, in an ignorant way, over the wonderful gifts that Mr. Eglinton has received from his Maker. I say 'ignorant' advisedly, because you have no right to sneer at anything that you know only by hearsay. Now I who write to you went to see Mr. Eglinton by appointment. I took with me my mother, my sister-in-law, and my wife. I bought two new single slates at a shop, and my sister bought a double slate. We four sat in Mr. Eglinton's drawing-room in full daylight, a common deal table before us, with no cloth on it. I wrote a question on one of the slates, and then fastened the two slates together face to face with a piece of string, putting inside a tiny piece of slate-pencil. Mr. Eglinton held the slate just under the flap of the table, in my full view. In about thirty seconds I heard—so did my friends—the gentle scratching of a slate-pencil, and then it ceased. I untied the slates very carefully, and there saw an answer written under my question, and the tiny point of pencil remaining at the last line of the last word. The same thing occurred with my sister, and her own double slate. She had an answer that the person she sought to find in the spheres could not be found at once, but that the intelligence or spirit would seek for him. Then came a test that would have satisfied even you. I lashed the two slates as before together, having previously cleaned the slates, and asked another question, and put in the same crumb of pencil. Mr. Eglinton then held the slate high up over the table with one hand, and my sister held the other end. Longer time was taken now before an answer came, and Mr. Eglinton seemed much distressed. In about two minutes the pencil began writing, and, as before, suddenly stopped. I opened the slates and there was a distinct answer to my question, written on closed and tied slates, held in the air by my sister as well as Mr. Eglinton. There has been, and will be, plenty of humbug in the Spiritualistic phenomena, but that does not the least affect the facts, absolute facts, such as I have just roughly laid before you, and you will make a strange mistake if you allow your paper to sneer at the marvellous, yet most simple, acts of communion that are daily occurring between the spirit world and our own. The Bible is one long history of this communion between the heavens and the hells and earth. Why should this have ceased, or how can it have ceased? Our parsons' asseverations will not alter God's laws."

The illustrious Agnostic "Saladin" does not meet my challenge fairly, according to my notion of the fitness of things. Probably he may be better engaged in fighting Mr. Bradlaugh. He, like Mr. Huxley, Mr. Tyndall, Dr. Carpenter, and other illustrious men, is committed to certain opinions which it might be troublesome to change. Mr. Bradlaugh ran an awful risk when he sat on the committee of the Dialectical Society. Of course, I do not expect any free and accepted Agnostic to visit Mr. Eglinton.

I observe that a "prophetic conference" has been held in Exeter Hall, to compare notes as to the proximity of the Second Advent. Are spiritual manifestations fulfilling the prophecies? Is the Salvation Army a sign as well as a wonder? Are the "earthquakes in divers places" to be spiritual or material?

"Tremendous woes," the Rev. M. Baxter says, "must soon come upon the world which at present is slumbering and heedless of the bomb-shell that in a few years is to burst upon it." But we are always having tremendous woes—the Soudan disasters, for example, or the cholera now raging in Spain, or the dynamite explosions.

On the other hand, The Christian publishes a sermon by Rev. H. J. Gamble, Upper Clapton, who doubts if miracles are frequent, necessary, or even useful. There is not a trace of miracles in the 2,500 years of the Patriarchs. Mr. Gamble holds that miracles began with Moses and ended with the Apostles. In the present day they are not needed.

No: "not needed," and here comes the reason why. The greatest pretender to miraculous power has been the Church of Rome, and the evidence for many of its miracles is apparently as strong as that adduced by faith-healers. In the Lancet of June 21st, 1885, Dr. Buchanan, Professor of Clinical Surgery at Glasgow University, writes thus: "I have no doubt that some of the persons who went (to the Grotto of Lourdes) lame and crippled were restored to the use of their limbs, and were relieved of pains and aches." And Dr. Buchanan goes on to give an account of some of his own cures, which he considers quite as remarkable as either the Roman Catholic miracles or those of the faith-healers.

The Rev. Mr. Gamble's conclusion is that: "The supernatural is around and about us. Not all the rationalism or scepticism of the age, not the clear and penetrating light which science pours on every wonder, not the discovery of the impossibilities that have been palmed on the credulous, can effectually dispose of all the marvels which are recorded, and to which testimony that has not been shaken is borne. There are dreams, and visions, and magnetic forces centring in certain individuals, enabling them to perform wonderful things, and there is evidence for all this, so perfectly trustworthy that we are constrained to admit that there are more things in the world than our philosophy dreams of, experience verifies, or reason confirms."

But why not say, in so many plain words, that the facts of Spiritualism are beyond denial?

THE doctrine of re-incarnation is not commonly received in England, nor in the United States, where Mr. Jesse Shepherd makes conspicuous efforts to extend it; and we are informed that it is extending. The people speaking the Latin dialects, those of France, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Belgium, South America, and Mexico, all accept it. We believe the doctrine strengthens the bases for the social reforms to which Spiritualism tends.—Le Spiritisme.

BARON HUMBOLD was present at some magnetic experiments by one of Mesmer's disciples, Dr. Wolfen, on a respectable lady, who communicated the fact to me. At the conclusion, Humboldt said, "I cannot deny the effects. I see in them a vast field for study; but I am too old and too much absorbed in other inquiries to engage in them." What so eminent a savant as Humboldt said of experiments in Human Magnetism ought surely to have weight with other savants, however eminent they may be.—RAGAZZI.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE:

CHAMBERS: 16, CRAVEN STREET, CHANCERY CROSS, S.W.

This Society of Spiritualists, founded for the purpose, primarily, of uniting those who share a common faith, and then of giving information respecting that faith to those who seek for it, has now occupied Chambers at the above address. There will be found an extensive Library of works especially attractive to Spiritualists; the various Journals of Spiritualism published in this and other countries; and opportunities of converse with friends like-minded. The Alliance holds periodical Soirées at the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, where papers on interesting phases of the subject are read, and discussion is invited.

Particulars as to Membership (minimum Annual Subscription, One Guinea) may be obtained from the Hon. Sec.,

MORELL THEOBALD,

62, Granville Park, Blackheath, S.E.

The following list, which will be continued by the courtesy of the editor until complete, will show what an important library is now available for use by members of the London Spiritualist Alliance. It is the desire of the Council that the books should be used by Spiritualists, and should not merely be available for consultation in our Chambers. To this end they have made arrangements for their being removed, under certain restrictions, for home reading. The publication of a catalogue in "LIGHT" will place at the disposal of every member a list which will enable him to select at his leisure what he may wish to read. Rules and regulations will be at once drawn up, so that the Library may be available without unnecessary delay.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliottson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman, U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstülpe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavaire, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this. What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which diverse circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present, and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARNETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROWWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of (so-called) Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of anylegerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

"4th May, 1847."

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847."

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely untrustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitative manifestations is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

STATUVOLENCE.—I.

BY WILLIAM BAKER FAHNESSOCK, M.D.

The term Statuvolence is derived from two Latin words, viz., status, a state or condition, and volō, will—meaning thereby a state or condition, caused by the will of the patient and not by that of the "magnetiser" or operator. This condition is identical with natural somnambulism, differing only in being induced with the consent or will of the patient. Mesmer supposed this state to be caused by "animal magnetism," and to be under his control, when the power was wholly in the patient; and the cures said to have been effected by it were simply the result of faith, or a belief, upon the part of the patient, that certain effects would follow the manipulations used, or the laying on of hands practised.

It is high time that the truth in regard to effecting cures was understood by the public. But before it will be possible for Statuvolence to effect a general relief of human suffering it will be necessary to abandon the idea of an "animal magnetic influence," for that prevents the study of facts, which would demonstrate its folly. Man, although naturally independent, has been so cramped by creeds and 'isms that he is scarcely himself, and to become free he must rise above the obstacles that have enslaved him, and, being properly taught, he will soon discover and demonstrate that he is master of himself, and can throw his body or any part of it, independently of the rest, into and out of the statuvolic condition at pleasure, and thus ignore the idea of being negative, or subject to electricity, magnetism, or any other outside influence. Because clairvoyants can see streams of light emanating from the fingers of excited persons, "magnetisers" concluded (without any other proof) that it was "animal magnetism," when it was only the scent, aura, or effete matter of the individual. This scent, being material, can be communicated to paper or other things, by rubbing or handling, and, being peculiar in every person, enables spirits to approach those who are near it as well as if the medium were present. If, therefore, the persons to whom such paper is sent are clairvoyant they can see the spirits thus attracted by it, and if diseased, and have faith in it, may be relieved; but in no case will they be so, or will any cure be effected, if they have no faith in the healing qualities of the paper or of the spirits. Indeed, all cures are the result of faith, or of a condition of Statuvolence, induced by that belief, or other causes which are possible, among which are excitements of all kinds, whether of a religious nature, or of fright, fear, hope, joy, grief, or a belief in the power of men or spirits, &c. A study and experience of over forty years has proved this to be true—but it will take time for the masses to realise that Statuvolence, or educated somnambulism, has developed facts as extraordinary as they are useful, and consists of powers, which to be perfectly understood, we have been obliged to compound into one word, namely, clearmindedness, or the ability to see, hear, taste, smell, or feel independently of the external senses, or by the mind or internal faculties, which can be exercised at a distance as well as near by. Time has demonstrated these truths to thousands, as the future, no doubt, will to all—that those persons who have been properly taught can throw their body, or any part of it, independent of the rest, into or out of the condition in an instant, and when the body, or any part of it, is in this state it can be rendered cataleptic or insensible to pain by an act of the patients' will, and the parts can be kept in that state as long as they please, or as it may be necessary to effect the cure. They can also create pain in any part if so disposed, and cast it off at pleasure. This fact proves that we may, and often do, create the ills that afflict us, even in our natural condition. What stronger proof than its demonstration do we need to verify the fact that man has within himself the godlike power to feel or not, or cure himself independent of anyone? We would, therefore, say to all: educate the young in the art of Statuvolence, and the follies of the past, as well as of the present, will disappear, as the rising generations shall embrace the truth, and become masters of themselves.

INSTRUCTIONS.

When persons desire to enter the condition, the instructions usually given are those which will tend to quiet the nerves and relax the muscular system.

The former is accomplished by avoiding everything calculated to excite the mind; the latter, by relaxing, or giving up all the fibres of the body, and making no resistance to any of the sensations which may be experienced. If the head "swims," or a toppling sensation is felt, it must not be disturbed; if the eyelids or any other parts of the body twitch, they must not be prevented from doing so; should the head seem to become enlarged, or the body heavy or light, or seem to go up or sink down, these and all other sensations that may be experienced must be given way to, for doing so will induce a reliant disposition and, consequently, a condition of mind favourable to entering the condition. Anything, also, which will abstract the mind from the body will conduce to the end in view. Music, harmony, or in fact, any other emotion of the mind that soothes or relaxes the nervous system, is favourable to the production of the state.

After having been comfortably seated, the patient should be directed to close the eyes at once, and not to open them until requested to do so. Closing the eyes is important, as it prevents visibility and external objects from attracting attention; and the request not to open them is designed to prevent him making the attempt, which will bring the mind back to the surrounding objects, and thus disturb any progress that may have been made. After closing the eyes, the patient should be directed to cast his mind to some familiar place, just as if he were really there, and in thought to place himself before the house, and to form a picture of it in his mind from recollection, then successively to enter the house, pass around the room, and from room to room, seeking those he may desire to find. If any person or thing is seen, the mind should be carried close up to it, and if the object be a person, the patient should endeavour to see what such person may be doing, at the same time that he listens to what may be said, or is transpiring, &c. When the patient tires of one thing or place he should be directed to others, successively, until clairvoyance is induced. When this has taken place, the body, generally, falls into the insensible condition, and the patient then can feel or not, as he pleases, independent of anyone. Almost everyone requires peculiar management, which can only be learned by experience, or a knowledge of character. We have had some enter the state perfectly after twenty unsuccessful trials and then had them tell us that if they had followed our instructions they would have fallen into it at the first sitting. This shows that if they do not enter the state at the first sitting they do something to prevent it.

Being in the condition does not prevent patients from opening their eyes and seeing with the natural eye at the same time that the rest of the body is in the insensible condition. Indeed, we have had some men go into the harvest-field while in the state, with their eyes open, and do more work than anyone else, and at night throw themselves out of the state, without feeling the slightest fatigue. This may seem incredible to those who have no knowledge of their powers, but the time is even now to some, and soon will be to others, when work will be considered play, and fatigue or pain things of the past. We would, therefore, say to all, study the art thoroughly and as the greatest boon you can confer upon suffering humanity. Teach the young Statuolence, if you would render posterity independent and free from the follies of the past.

PARIS.—We learn that a "Société de Psychologie Physiologique" has been formed at Paris, of which M. Charcot is president and M. Richet is secretary. It is to study psychical phenomena in normal as well as in pathological subjects, after the method of observation and experimentation.—Le Messager.

SARAGOSSA.—The organ of Freethought and Spanish Republicanism, Un Periodico Mas, has opened a column under the title of "Free Tribune," into which it admits correspondence on Spiritism. This speaks well for Spanish liberalism; it affords a good example to the journals advocating Freethought in France.—Le Spiritisme.

A MAN'S clothing becomes charged with his magnetism without any effort on his part that it become so. And in walking he uses up this motor power as surely as does the locomotive while running over the iron rails; and this expended magnetism settles down to the earth forming the only means by which the dog is enabled to scent his master's footsteps; and so, because his master's coat has been involuntarily charged with it, the dog is enabled to distinguish it from another's coat.—PROFESSOR CADWELL, in "Facts."

AMERICA.—The American Spiritualists have a problem to solve here. The journals of the United States contain reports of the examination before a local court at Kansas City, Missouri, of Mr. J. H. Mott, a medium, on the charge of fraud, brought by a man who, to prove that he was right in saying that a so-called materialised spirit was the medium disguised, squirted a coloured liquor upon it, which colour was subsequently found upon the medium. As to Mr. J. H. Mott's genuine mediumship, testimony was given by Judge Ess, Ex-Mayor Chase, Ex-Sheriff Anderson, Dr. Thorne, and others, whose testimony no one could dispute. They swore that they had seen at the defendant's séances forms of their deceased relatives, who had proved their identity by their conversation; that they had seen the medium while they so talked with them. The proceedings drew great crowds, and the reports were telegraphed to the great newspapers, and have been copied by nearly every journal in the States. All this shows that the interest in Spiritualism is increasing in America.—Le Messager.

THE HARMONY OF SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE.

BY ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, LL.D.

I find some difficulty in comprehending the exact position of Mr. Frederick F. Cook in his elaborate "Rejoinder" to my article, but with your permission I will briefly notice his direct criticisms of my views, because they have a certain amount of plausibility owing to the extremely condensed form in which I was compelled to express myself in the space that was allowed me.

Mr. Cook first objects to my proposition that—"man consists essentially of a spiritual nature or mind intimately associated with a spiritual body or soul, both of which are developed in, and by means of, a material organism." This, he says, is a case of spiritual suicide, and is directly opposed to my previous statement that—"mind is the cause of organism and perhaps even of matter itself." But surely, it is clear that in the last quoted passage I am speaking of mind in the abstract or as a fundamental principle, while in the former I am dealing with mind as individualised in the human form. There is, I conceive, no contradiction in believing that mind is at once the cause of matter and of the development of individualised human minds through the agency of matter. And when, further on, he asks, "Does mortality give consciousness to spirit, or does spirit give consciousness for a limited period to mortality?" I would reply, "Neither the one nor the other; but, mortality is the means by which a permanent individuality is given to spirit."

His next serious objection is to my supposition that, "it may well be that evolution is a fundamental law of the universe of mind as well as that of matter." This, he says, is a purely materialistic thought. But here again it is clear by the context that I am referring solely to the development of individualised human minds, of which alone we know, or can know, anything, not to mind in the abstract, of which we know absolutely nothing; and I see no materialism in the supposition that such finite individualised minds can only be produced under some law of evolution.

The last special criticism refers to my belief that "progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world" is dependent on the cultivation of our higher moral feelings here. My critic says that this is an utter denial of justice or equality, because our moral nature, as well as our environment, is imposed upon us; but he does not say whether he accepts the alternative position, that all are to be at once good and happy in the future state, and that the most selfish, vicious, and sensual are to make equal progress with the benevolent, self-sacrificing, and virtuous. It seems to me that this latter condition of things would be the most opposed to justice, and even to possibility, and would render the present world, with all its trials, a hopeless and insoluble mystery, while it is certainly opposed to the whole body of information and teaching which we receive from spiritual sources.

It seems to me that my critic, throughout, confuses together the general with the special, the universal with the individual, in discussing the relations of spirit and matter, while he equally confounds proximate with ultimate results in his remarks on the spiritual world. My observations and reasonings have been confined throughout to the nature and relations of individualised human minds and their proximate condition in the spirit world. Speculations on the nature or origin of mind in general as well as those on the ultimate states to which human minds may attain in the infinite future, I look upon as altogether beyond the range of our faculties, and to be, therefore, utterly untrustworthy and profitless.

THE Spiritual Offering claims to "devote special care to the defence of mediums and to the best means for protecting them from the assaults of enemies of the cause; considering that the progress of Spiritualism depends upon mediumship, and that every blow aimed at mediums is an attack upon the cause."

The Historic Jesus.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I think Mr. Maitland is not justified in saying that my "letter of the 4th inst. seems to indicate a railing spirit against those who presume to differ from me, rather than an attempt to elucidate truth," and I would beg to assure him that my letter was dictated only by my intense conviction of the importance of the great truth of the historic Jesus.

I have also to complain of Mr. Maitland characterising my letter as being "discourteous, presumptuous, superficial, flippant, insincere, and ignorant." These expressions are almost identical with those used against me by Madame Blavatsky some two years ago, when I ridiculed the pretensions of her Koot Hoomi; but, nevertheless, the said Koot Hoomi was at last shown to be a "painted bladder up a tree."

The doctrine that Jesus Christ was a mythical Personage existed even in the days of the disciples of Jesus, and it is against these opinions that the "beloved disciple" writes (1 John iv. 1-3) "Many false prophets are gone out into the world. . . . Every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit which confesseth not Jesus is not of God: and this is the spirit of the Antichrist."—(R.V.)

As Mr. Maitland is at least comparatively indifferent as to the historic Jesus, so he may be contemptuous regarding the views held by the "beloved disciple"; but for myself, the words of Jesus and of His disciples have more weight with me than the teachings of Mr. Maitland, and I believe the doctrine of the mythical Jesus to be entirely false and most pernicious in its tendency.

I still maintain that the variations in the Gospels are either verbal or insignificant, and do not affect the grandeur of the historic portrait, and that the date of the flight into Egypt, or even the date of the Crucifixion and Ascension, is entirely immaterial.

With regard to the Miraculous Conception, it is a subject too profound to be treated parenthetically, but in a scientific point of view it presents little difficulty to those who believe in the inter-penetrability of matter and in the power of spirit to dissolve and recreate material substances and human bodies.

In replying to my letter, Mr. Maitland somewhat oversteps bounds in ridiculing certain views which he says I held three years ago; but as he has done so I may be excused for informing the readers of "LIGHT" that in those days he and I had repeated discussions on the doctrines of reincarnation and the mythical Jesus Christ, when one day, finding me impervious to his views, he thus solemnly uttered himself: "The views I hold come direct from the highest Divine fountain of all truth, and if you do not accept them you must be a man forsaken of the Gods."

If these be the views Mr. Maitland holds regarding himself, while he considers me to be "superficial, flippant, insincere, and ignorant," it must be useless in me to argue with him; but I may be permitted to say this: that the longer I live the more I become convinced that unless the Spiritualistic workers of the day determine, so far as human feebleness will permit, to submit their thoughts and works to the standard of the life and teachings of the personal Jesus Christ, the movement must end in disorder, selfishness, and ruin.

GEORGE WYLD, M.D.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have followed with much interest the discussion now being carried on in your pages, between the leaders of the Hermetic Society and Dr. Wyld, the careful perusal of which has left no doubt in my mind of the very untenable position held by the latter.

Can he not surely see the hopelessness of what is called harmonising the Gospels on the outer plane, and of keeping to that plane on its historical basis, the difficulties rising hydra-like in every direction? And how the student, by keeping only to the outer and historical plane, builds his own inextricable

* At the earnest request of some of our subscribers we have given place to one or two more letters on this subject. We wish, however, to impress upon our correspondents that the discussion will be definitely closed after next week. Any replies must, therefore, be in our hands by Monday next.—ED. OF "LIGHT."

labyrinth? The system, as taught by the Hermetic teachings, appears to me a most luminous solution of a hitherto unexplained mystery.

Following the Divine doctrine of correspondences known always by the wisdom teachers of old, doubtless some earthly personage may have been the material prototype of the Man Jesus. It is said He was the Rabbi Jeshua by occult students. He may have represented by His blameless life and His knowledge of Divine wisdom the Archetypal Man, i.e., a Buddha—one whose long series of re-incarnations had placed Him so much in advance of His fellow man, that when He said that He was one with God He meant very differently to the meaning assigned to that saying by medieval and modern thought.

Had He meant it, as Dr. Wyld and others think, what a hopeless prospect for us!!!

I agree with Mr. Roden Noel. We do crave for the realisation of our ideals; and in the sacred Scriptures of all countries we read of these Divine men who have trod the path before us—not one only, not the historic or non-historic Jesus, but many have been those whose lives have been the same; the Christ-lives, those who in themselves have been all Christs. Only one person could be the historic Jesus—so that His life on the historic plane signifies but little.

Surely, Dr. Wyld's expression by way of admiration and worship of the historic Jesus, of Him "as the most intense human personality in all we know of the universe" is not founded on the doctrine as taught by Christ, which was the abnegation of personality. If the historic Jesus had been the most intense personality in all the universe (Dr. Wyld might have said more modestly, this planet, as neither he nor any one else knows anything or anyone outside of it), surely that extraordinary Personality must have met with more intense recognition, and we should have had no cause for discussion on the matter; it would have been placed beyond all question, and mankind would have been treated differently.

In plain words, Dr. Wyld holds the strange doctrine that has ruled the ordinary and unreflective minds of the orthodox Trinitarians for centuries, otherwise he would perceive, with the teachers of the Hermetic doctrines and all esoteric teachings, that the Revelation consists in the raising of man to the Christ-life, i.e., in the raising of the mind of material man to the higher plane of consciousness on which alone is the Christ comprehended.

With the esoteric key to the Gospels the historic discrepancies matter little, notwithstanding I feel also with Mrs. Kingsford's desire that it were possible for some one to bring them into closer union and harmony, so that the correspondence of both planes of thought would be perfect.

Why should Dr. Wyld object to the statement that there is virtually no such thing as history? Surely all philosophy decrees this. If time, present, past, and future only exists through our senses how can there be really history? It is history only to our senses. In the great visions of the prophets, the record of them in the Scriptures, in the ancient languages, is couched invariably in the present tense. "I see the vision, and the vision shows a picture of things being enacted before my eyes." We make history through our finite senses, therefore it can never be truth to us on its physical plane.

It is the tendency of mankind to make idols, for it is always easier to worship someone who has done a thing than to try to accomplish the work oneself; and the accretion of ages has only intensified the false doctrine—that of worshipping the man Jesus. To believe that there was but one Christ—a human personality, an historic fact—that no such had come before, and none had followed after, would indeed to me be one of the darkest thoughts imaginable. Where would be the hopes for the human race? Dead and gone.

By the human race I don't only mean the followers of Christianity, but I mean the human race who never heard, and never will hear, of the historic Christ. Into what a terrible sea of difficulty we should all be thrown back, after having floundered out through the teaching of the spiritual thought of the day!

Let us keep to our ideals, for we can imagine nothing that does not exist, and if therefore we imagine the utmost conceivable idea of nobleness and sublimity, because the ideal we have exists, it is the reflection in us of the real. Let us calm ourselves, and by trying to reach that ideal goal we are fitting ourselves for the true comprehension of the Christ! It is a philosophical axiom that we cannot understand what does not exist in ourselves. To understand Christ we must reach our ideal. Living on a lower plane we may put the man Jesus on a pedestal and fall down and worship and grovel on the ground, and we may grovel in vain. We have made the pedestal an idol, and the whole superstructure is ours—and it is this weighty superstructure which kills the divine in man.

The Hermetic teachings of the West and the Theosophic teachings of the East point both to the same light which will illuminate the minds of the next generation of our children's children. After centuries of darkness, why should any Spiritualist try to drag us backward into that Slough of Despond from which spiritual thought has only lately rescued us, and from which people are daily emerging, thankful to feel that after all their wings are safe!

ISABEL DE STEIGER.

The Studios, 8, Avonmore-road, West Kensington.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Historical records differ wholly both in nature and in terms from mathematical or arithmetical formulæ. These represent the only exact science; while there is nothing in the world so inexact as "history."

The fact that two and two make four is a fact essential and abstract; it posits an idea, and is only conceivable and recognisable as an idea. Wherefore it is an eternal verity; because two and two not only made four in the past, but make four now, and will continue to make four so long as the world shall last.

It is not necessary that any inspired writer of antiquity should inform us of such a fact as this, for its evidence does not rest on authority but inheres in the terms of the fact itself, and on the immediate recognition of the human intelligence.

Dr. Wyld is, therefore, comparing things that are not similar.

The same may be said of his statement that fire warms, that food satisfies hunger, and the like. These facts are not historical; I verify them in my own experience every day, and need not that any should testify to me about them.

Mr. Maitland's letter has answered the other objections made to our position by Dr. Wyld, and I need not, therefore, notice them.

If, when all the legendary framework, obviously unhistorical and allegorical, is removed from about the central figure of the great Christian Mythos, Dr. Wyld still thinks that what is left constitutes of that figure "the most important historic person this planet has ever known," I shall be curious to hear how he will substantiate his opinion. Of the thirty-three years which Jesus is said to have lived, the Gospels affect to give only the events of the last three. Concerning nearly all the rest, they are dumb. Consequently, they give us in no sense whatever "a life" of Jesus; and what they do give is obviously mostly mythical.

What, under such conditions, can we know or divine of the "historical Jesus," as He really was?

We know far more of Gautama Buddha; of Pythagoras; of Apollonius; of Plato; of Socrates.

As for my own personality, I doubt much whether it will be an historical "fact" eighteen centuries hence, that I lived at all, much less that I was "President of the Hermetic Society." If ever I pass into "history," no doubt just as many foolish and untrue things will be said of me as are now said of Rosamond Clifford, of Joan of Arc, of Marie Stuart, and of every other personage of the past.

Already, I am aware that many supposed "facts" which are wholly baseless, have been told and believed concerning me; and I have observed a similar state of things in respect of several of my contemporaries.

ANNA KINGSFORD, M.D.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I am in utter bewilderment at Mr. Maitland's examples of "discrepancies" in the Gospels, so perhaps you will allow me to say a few words on the subject, and in the first place to remark that there is no need for Mr. Maitland to deem himself insulted because Dr. Wyld is "discourteous" enough to meet the said "assertions" of "discrepancy" with a "flat contradiction." Why, in the name of Wonder, should a Christian not assert his creed by "flatly contradicting" an armed host at the risk of his life, if necessary, like some Red Cross Knight of old? Dr. Wyld is not bound, more than myself, to accept as guides the "best array of competent and candid scholars," who have illumined the "last half-century" by searching for "discrepancies" in the Gospels, in preference to the infinitely greater and equally competent and candid scholars who through many half-centuries have devoted themselves to an opposite line of inquiry, with the result of arriving at a totally different conclusion. I have never read the works of scholars either on one side or the other, so I shall simply let the Gospels speak for themselves in answer to Mr. Maitland's objections.

"To cite," says Mr. Maitland, "a few of the contradictions we must believe that if Christ was not born of Joseph and Mary He could not have been of the house of David." Now Roman Catholics, like myself, are taught in our earliest lessons that Mary was also of the house of David and a distant relative of Joseph.

However, as to this there is nothing for or against it in the letter of the Gospels although the tradition rests on the same authority as the authenticity of the Gospels themselves, viz., on the authority of the Catholic Church. But very different is Mr. Maitland's next assertion, viz., "That we must believe that Jesus did go down into Egypt, His parents having fled thither on the night following the visit of the Magi, and also that He did not go into Egypt, but remained where He was born, to be circumcised the eighth day, and after forty days to accompany His mother to Jerusalem." Now, sir, permit me to say that any "candid scholar" who could manage to concoct a creed like this from reading the two Gospels which give an account of our Lord's birth must have been sadly at a loss for a "discrepancy"!

We certainly do believe that Jesus went to Egypt after the departure of the Magi, although it need not have been the night after exactly. St. Matthew simply says, "When they were departed." At the same time, we believe that the events recorded by St. Luke, viz., the Circumcision and Purification—matters of course—naturally took place before the visit of the "wise men." The shepherds of Bethlehem were sent to the "stable," and found the "babe wrapped in swaddling clothes," but the Magi were guided to the "house" where the "young Child" and His mother were.

The Arabian astrologers "saw His star in the East"; they knew that a wonderful Child—a mighty One—was born, and they came to worship or to honour Him. The journey alone would take forty days, even if they came from a come-at-able part of Arabia instead of from Persia or India—as some think they did. The "young Child" visited by the Magi is always represented as a child able to stretch out its hands for their gifts, so there was ample time to be presented in the Temple at Jerusalem before the massacre of innocents began. Moreover, the children slain were aged up to two years. The two Evangelists simply relate different events in the life of Jesus. St. Luke says nothing of the flight into Egypt or the cause of it, but states that the Child "grew up at Nazareth," which is quite consistent with His having visited Egypt. Take a London boy of twelve; would it not be quite consistent to say that the child grew up in London, even if he had passed a year of his babyhood in Paris?

I cannot perceive either "discrepancy" or contradiction in the statements of the two Evangelists, so that if there is any confusion in Mr. Maitland's mind as to the going or not going into Egypt, it is produced by those wise men of the West, who have enlightened the last half-century, rather than by Matthew and Luke.

Then Mr. Maitland fancies that St. Luke contradicts himself with regard to the Ascension—in his Gospel and in his history of the Acts. Now, there is not a word about time in the last chapter of St. Luke, except that the disciples having seen Jesus, Who vanished from their sight, returned that same hour to Jerusalem, and when they were talking on this mysterious subject Jesus again stood in the midst of them. But what time elapsed between their return to Jerusalem and the time when they were "thus speaking" St. Luke deponeth not in his Gospel although he does in his history of the Acts of the Apostles. And with regard to the alleged discrepancy in the manner of Judas' death, it is a merely verbal one. St. Matthew tells us that he threw down the thirty pieces of silver in the Temple and went and hanged himself. Then the chief priests took the silver pieces and bought the field to bury strangers in, as it was not lawful to cast the price of blood into the treasury. St. Luke in the Acts, says, "This man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity, and falling headlong," &c., &c., but the construction of the verse in the original Greek might just as well be rendered: "With the reward of iniquity, to this man a field was purchased," &c., &c., and the manner of death recorded by the two Evangelists might easily have been coincident, seeing that such an event happened in the neighbourhood where I now write—not so long ago. An unfortunate man hanged himself. The rope broke, he fell headlong on some agricultural implements with the same horrible results ascribed to Judas. As for the astounding statement that Christ's "mother joined His 'brethren' in attempting to withdraw Him from a public career on the ground of madness," why does not Mr. Maitland give us his authority in chapter and verse? Surely he cannot expect such startling information to be accepted merely on the "ipse dixit" which he himself condemns! But I may not take up your valuable space by pursuing matters further, as these alleged discrepancies have doubtless been answered over and over again. Most certainly the New Testament does not give a complete history of our Lord. St. John expressly states in figurative language that not a tenth part is recorded, but enough is related to set before us the high and holy standard, the "Excelsior," the Hope and Comfort of so many pilgrim souls. It is, therefore, very evident that people like Dr. Wyld and myself, who see matters in a different light from Mr. Maitland, are quite prepared "flatly to contradict" those who insist that the Evangelists contradict each other, and we see no reason why our "presumption" should be considered amusing, or, at least, more amusing than the presumption on the other side. Neither ought Mr. Maitland to call us "flippant, superficial, and insincere," without any proof worth mentioning. Even if Dr. Wyld, like myself, had the humility to acknowledge that he was no profound Biblical scholar, we should at the same time consider the above terms equally applicable to Mr. Maitland, or even to the candid and competent modern sages whom he so much admires.

In short, it would be the old story of the kettle and the pot. But why, in the name of all that is unreasonable, should people have uncomplimentary epithets applied to them because they decline to read the Gospels by the candles of the Hermetic Society, preferring rather the light of that older and better and more earned society who first gave them the documents in question, viz., the Christian Church?

While it is quite open to doubt the mystic sense of the Gospels, it is difficult to see what benefit could be obtained by attempting to damage the historical element in them; and as the attempt is not at all likely to be successful, would it not be better to "move on"? There are so many interesting subjects for the society to grapple with, and after all the dispute may be pretty much like that of the two knights who fought to the death about the colour of a shield, each having seen a different side of it.—Yours very truly,

CAROLINE CATHERINE CAMPBELL.

Astrology.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I have read the letter of your correspondent, "C.C.M.," in a recent issue of "LIGHT," and quite agree with his remarks about "Astrology."

I myself have studied the subject, at first merely by way of recreation, but afterwards more seriously, and I am bound to say that the results of my investigations were certainly peculiar. I once glanced through an old book entitled, "Magus; or, the Celestial Intelligence," published, I believe, about 100 years ago, wherein the author, amongst other things, says that the mind of man, which is the part most closely allied to Heaven or the Celestial World, is, therefore, the medium of communication between the Celestial and Material Worlds, and every thought, aspiration, or invention that proceeds from the brain was originally placed there by, what he calls, a "Celestial Intelligence," and that all thought is motion propagated from a higher intelligence to a lower, thus anticipating in part the Rede lecture delivered at Cambridge a few weeks ago; but differing from the latter in one essential particular, inasmuch as the lecturer places the motive force in the brain alone, and the old writer in question traces it back to the First Great Cause and thence, in a downward scale, from the spiritual to the material world by means of their connecting link—the mind of man. Now if the mind is acted upon in this way by outside intelligences is it not probable that the planetary positions at birth may influence the "native," or child born in a similar manner, the "intelligence" operating (whether for good or ill) being in accord with the influences prevailing at the time, and these influences acting and re-acting on the native at various times and in different ways, according as the planets aspect one another?

If the eclipses of the sun and moon, which occurred on the

* One or two copies of this work can be obtained at the office of "LIGHT." Price 2s.

16th and 30th of March last, are compared with events that immediately followed in North America and Afghanistan respectively, and regard is also paid to the position of the luminaries and the planets in the places referred to at the time, the peculiarity is certainly striking, not to mention the recent conjunction of the sun and Saturn, and the aspect they formed with Uranus, taken in connection with the colliery explosions, earthquakes, &c., of three weeks ago.

Surely the matter should be taken up, and, if even a grain of truth be in this old science of "Astrology," that grain should be extracted for the benefit of humanity generally, instead of ridiculing the subject as our scientific men now-a-days do.

If I can help "C.C.M." in any way I shall be glad to do so.—Yours, &c.,

J. MERCER.

London Spiritualist Alliance.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In collecting the library books of the late Central Association of Spiritualists, and putting them in order, we find several are missing, and noted as lent to members of the old society. To some I have applied for their return, but as I have not the addresses of several others may I ask, through your columns, that any member having now in his possession any book of the late Central Association of Spiritualists will be good enough to return it to the library here at his earliest convenience?—Your obedient servant,

The Resurrection Body.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Having been absent from home, and much occupied, I have only this morning read the letter signed "A Spiritualist and Chemist" that appears in your issue of July 4th.

It is therefore a matter of great satisfaction to me that notwithstanding his criticism on Dr. Wolfe's relation of Liebig's alleged successful experiment on the human body, the writer fully admits the possibility of dissolving the human body into its ultimate elements, in the following words—

"Of course, any one who chooses to exercise the requisite care and patience can dissolve a human or any other organised body into its ultimate elements."

Now this admission is all that is needed, and being in exact accordance with the result of my own inquiries amongst men of practical chemical science (as stated in my letter in the same issue as that of "A Spiritualist and Chemist"), I think I may fairly say that the argument used in my first letter on "The Resurrection Body," in reference to the Resurrection Body of our Lord, rests on a solid and allowable real foundation whether the words quoted from Dr. Wolfe's book are Liebig's or not.—Faithfully yours,

"LILY."

P.S.—You will do me a great favour by kindly inserting this letter in your valuable journal, at your earliest convenience.

SURE, the courts of Heaven are peopled with the outcasts of this world.—Marston.

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND'S APPOINTMENTS.—Sheffield: July 23rd and 24th. Leeds: July 26th, August 2nd and 30th. Nottingham: August 9th and 16th. Halifax: August 23rd and week days. Burnley (probably) September 6th. Morley (near Leeds): August 5th and 6th. Newcastle: September 13th. Week days in the vicinity of the above places.

MISS ROSAMOND DALE OWEN is now staying with friends who reside in the mountains of Virginia, and by complete rest she hopes to regain her health and strength. She thus relates how her faith served her in the hour of need: "In crossing the Atlantic a few days since, we were in imminent peril. We struck a large iceberg, crushing in the iron plates of the vessel. In that moment, when I felt that the next might bring a painful death, I realised as I had never done before that my religion had become as a rock under my feet, a sure foundation in the hour of greatest need. I could see that we were surrounded by millions of guardian angels, working with swift energy and unerring accuracy under the guidance of the Master of spirits, Jesus Christ, and above all reigned God the Father; therefore, though we were rocking about helplessly, the darkness of night made denser by a thick fog, though I realised that we might sink at any moment, I felt no tremor of fear. A religion thus proved is worth holding, is worth teaching, is worth listening to. Spiritualism was to me a great comfort; Christian Spiritualism has become as an impregnable fortress, a protection against all evil."

BIOLOGICAL RESEARCHES.

Few branches of scientific inquiry are receiving more careful attention at the present time than is that of Biology, which embraces every department of the life history of plants and animals, past and present, physico-vital and psychological. Biologists are deeply engaged, not merely in the study of living organisms, but also among the organic remains entombed in Palaeozoic, Mesozoic, and Cainozoic formations.

Palaeontological biologists are carefully searching rocks, from the long past Laurentian and Cambrian periods up to the present date, and have found intimate relations among the ever ascending orders of animal and vegetable organisms.

From the Devonian to the Permian, remains have been found of a peculiar fish, known as Ceratodus, and in the same formations remains of a closely related, if not generically the same fish, known as Ctenodus, have been found in great numbers and variety. It is a singular fact that fossil remains of these fishes have not been discovered before or after the deposition of the strata above-named, until living specimens of Ceratodus, fac-similes in teeth, head-bones, ribs, scales, &c., to the long extinct palaeozoic forms were found in the South Australian river, known as the Burnett. From time to time during the last decade of years, these fish have been obtained in small numbers in their Australian habitats, and the marvellous fact is that no remains of the fish have been found since the Permian era, and the only locality in which they are now found living is in Australia, while many millions of years ago, during the deposit of the carboniferous rocks, they swarmed in our northern palaeozoic estuaries and lagoons, and probably rivers. These fish are peculiar, inasmuch as in addition to being like ordinary fish, viz., gill-breathers, they are also lung-breathers, and closely approach to Batrachia, such as frogs, which during their embryonic condition are gill-breathers, and in their adult stage aqueous air-breathers.

Learned societies have sent trained observers, at much expense, to Australia and elsewhere, to study the habits of rare egg-laying quadrupeds, such as Ornithorynchus and Echidna, and the air-breathing and separate egg-laying fish, Ceratodus. Specimens of Peripatus with eggs, and Balanoglossus, an eccentric, worm-like form, with gills and vertebrae, are also being sought for and found. All this is very creditable and very interesting, but is no reason why more important and accessible studies nearer home should be neglected, and not merely neglected, but purposely shunned.

If the life histories of peculiar quadrupeds, fishes and worms are worthy of careful, self-sacrificing study, surely the true life history of man is more so. The study of man physically covers but a small portion of his being; he should also be studied mentally, morally, and spiritually, and if there be any objective evidence of a future life for mankind, that is specially worthy of investigation, as the long roll of evolution from protozoa to man appears to have been an effort of nature, through unnumbered ages, fully to produce a being different from, yet related to, all preceding, with a spiritual as well as a material nature.

To predicate impossibility is absurd; what isolated intelligence looking at a chaotic world with its highest inhabitant a protozoan, would ever predicate the subsequent advent of a being like man? The chance is now almost infinitely greater that there is a natural and spiritual man, one being the development of the other. If facts prove evolution, facts with greater force and cogency prove a future life for humanity. Materialism is based upon the proposition that there is no intelligence apart from a living, embodied, material brain, whilst the well-accredited facts of Modern Spiritualism demonstrate the occurrence of intellectual phenomena that no embodied human organisation can either produce or comprehend. Professor G. J. Romanes, in his recent article on Mind and Motion, in referring to Professor Clifford's heartrending opinion "that the mind of man perishes with his body, and that above the mind of man there is no other," affirms that the conclusions do not follow by way of any logical sequence from his premises. "Because, within the limits of human experience mind is only known as associated with brain, it clearly does not follow that mind cannot exist in any other mode." Had Professor Romanes been practically familiar with the elementary facts of Modern Spiritualism, he would have known that mind, apart from visible cerebral organism, is an established fact, and that there is the same kind, but not the same quantity of evidence,* for that transcendent fact as there is that in embodied human beings mental powers are always associated with brain structure.

CATALOGUE OF L. S. A. LIBRARY.—We very much regret that, owing to unavoidable delay, the usual instalment of this catalogue does not appear in this week's issue. It will be continued, however, next week.

"TWIN TWO WORLDS."—The special offer of this book to our readers expires on Saturday, July 25th. As "LIGHT" should be in the hands of subscribers by Friday evening, they will thus have a few hours wherein to make an application in the terms of our announcement on advertisement page ii. After Saturday evening we close our lists, and under no circumstances can applications reaching us after that date be entertained. The book by itself can then be ordered at 10s. 6d. per copy.

A FICTITIOUS NAME.—Mr. D. V. Mansfield relates in Facts: "A gentleman came to me for a sitting. After writing and sealing his message in the usual way, he handed it to me for answer. The answer, written through my hand, was: 'My dear husband, what have you been doing that you are ashamed of your name? A good judge never should be, and while I lived you were not called by a name not your own.' On the answer being put into his hand he burst into tears, and acknowledged his fault. My advice was to him, as it is to all, go honestly to a medium, and you will be satisfied."

A MATERIALIZATION SCÉNE is reported in Facts by Mr. Whitlock, April 30th, at Mrs. Fay's, Boston. At least fifty forms appeared, differing in size and appearance, and following one after the other in quick succession. They were mostly recognised. One talked with Mr. Whitlock, and disappeared; then Mr. Whitlock's father came with perfect features; then the spirit of an old friend of mine, who gave his name; then one of a very late man to Mr. Whitlock, giving him the Masonic grip. One form was that of a robust boy, who addressed some one as "Cousin Lew." Mr. Whitlock's sister came and embraced us both.

* If the evidence of critical and competent witnesses be of any value, abundant proofs of mind apart from cerebral organisation may be found in the literature of Spiritualism and especially in the writings of Mr. Hewitt, Robert Chambers, C. Varley, Epes Sargent, Professor Crookes, A. R. Wallace, M. A. (Oxon.), T. P. Barkas, Dr. Wilkinson, Dr. Hare, Judge Edmonds, and hundreds of other equally creditable witnesses.

FOUR VISIONS.

By "LILY."

There are five lessons taught in these four Visions:—

Vision 1 contains two lessons. 1st. The Spirit explanation of "The Trinity." 2nd. That Jesus is the Guide and Guardian of this planet, and is also the "Holy Spirit" or "Comforter" promised to us, and that He has been incarnate several times on the Earth for our progress.

Vision 2 teaches that our Guardian's Earthly incarnations being ended, His coming is now in Spiritual Glory, and as such is seen in this vision.

Vision 3 shows Him sending forth His ministering Spirits to all quarters of our globe, to teach us by sight and sign the grand fact of immortality.

Vision 4 teaches the only true and universal religion both in Heaven and Earth to be God's "Golden Rule."

"LILY."

No. I.

A GREAT MYSTERY.

In the silence of my chamber, in the stillness of the night,
When the fever of life's struggles no longer dims the sight,
Then my soul its power grasping, then my spirit taking wing,
Upsoars to Life Supernal, and to thoughts that round it cling.

And thus in meditation deep, one night not long gone by,
On that mystery of mysteries, "The Holy Trinity,"
Unrolled before my vision was a new translation given
In words that glowed as diamonds in the star-lit vault of Heaven.

"Oh, Mortal," thus the message ran—"we now unfold to thee
That yet unravelled mystery, 'The Holy Trinity':
Our Father-Mother, 'God Supreme,' Wisdom and Love in One, Creative Energy and Power, portrayed in 'God the Son.'"

"From Love Almighty, Love Supreme, conjoined with Wisdom high
In equal Majesty, sprang forth Creative Energy; (That power that bade the myriads of worlds that meet thy gaze
'To be,'
That power that peopled them with forms of life in harmony.")

"In these behold 'The Trinity' of Father-Mother-Son,
Of Wisdom, Love, and Power combined, the Holy 'Three-in-One':
One perfect Whole thus stands revealed to our adoring eye,
And thus interpret we to thee 'The Holy Trinity.'"

In awe I gazed; when gradually they faded from my view,
Those words of startling import, giving rise to thoughts so new.
Then where "The Holy Spirit" of the ancient Three-in-One?
Is He from His high place dethroned? His name and glory gone!

And where "The Jesus" of our love? Is He dethroned too?
A myth, a symbol only, is He now proclaimed to view?
He lost to us for evermore, round Whom our heart-strings cling,
Our precious Lord and Master, our Brother and our King?

"It cannot be, forbid it, God," in anguish deep I cried;
When lo! a gentle Voice in whispering accents by my side
Said, "Fear not, Child, but listen while we yet expound to thee
Our second lesson gathered from 'The Holy Trinity.'"

"The Father-Mother-Son, the perfect Wisdom, Love, and Power,
Know well their children's needs from day to day, from hour to hour;
Know well they need a loving Guide, a Guardian to watch o'er
Their faltering steps and lead them on from Shore to brighter Shore.

"And such is Jesus, called 'The Christ,' in Ancient times, as now,
'The Expression' of the Three-in-One, embodied here below
As Christna, Buddha, Jesus, born on earth to lead the way
To ever clearer, brighter Light, unto meridian day.

"And such The Holy Spirit is; 'The Comforter' foretold
By Jesus, when on earth He lived some thirty years, of old;
'Twas of Himself He prophesied, that He would ever be,
Nearer and ever nearer drawn to our humanity.

"And hath He not His word fulfilled? 'The Comforter' hath been
In every hour of need to all who draw near unto Him?
Whether as Christna, Buddha, Christ, 'tis still God's 'Holy Son,' God's 'Holy Spirit' sent to earth from God the 'Three-in-One.'"

"'Tis He, the Comforter and Guide, dear Guardian, tender Friend,
Who from all time the Mission had, thy Planet, 'Earth,' to tend;
'Tis He, 'The Expression' of our God, incarnate for Earth's weal,
In earthly robes of differing forms, but the same Spirit still.

"Know then, oh Child, and understand the lessons taught thee now
Of grand and mighty Truths; and may thy Soul and Spirit bow
In deep humility before that Wisdom, Love, and Power, That deigns thee knowledge so sublime; a precious, priceless
dower."

In awe these wondrous words I heard, flashed to me from above
As living Truths upon my Soul, vouchsafed to me in love,
And with deep gratitude in prayer and praise, my Soul overflowed
To Him, the Almighty "Three-in-One," Love, Wisdom, Power—
"God."

January 24th, 1885.

II.

"AND I SAW A GREAT LIGHT."

Reclining in my old armchair, from worldly cares set free,
The inner Soul expanding in a thoughtful reverie
On all the wonders of my life, since first the "opened door"
Yielded its sweet communion with the loved ones gone before.

Methought the chamber glistened with a strange supernal light
Of golden hue! I upward gazed, when lo! a wondrous sight
Was shown unto me! In the air, mid sunlight's dazzling rays, Stood forms majestic! Three were there, presented to my gaze.

And side by side stood they—in beauty unapproachable,
Yet in ascending scale! The third, so grandly beautiful,
No words of earthly language could the portraiture convey,
Of that Soul-illuminated Being, in His glittering array!

"Put off thy shoes from off thy feet," I heard a Voice then say,
"For the place whereon thou standest is most holy ground this day.
Rememberest thou the Vision of the three-fold-mystery?
Rememberest thou the lessons that we then vouchsafed to thee?"

"Look upward now, for yet another lesson must thou learn
Of truths that shall proclaimed be, before the noonday sun:
For now the time appointed is, now is the 'Day of Grace,'
When—the veil uprolled—a grander light shall shine upon thy race."

I looked! The Blessed Three were there! And as I looked, I saw
That cords of light attached them to each other evermore,
And over them, in words of gold, illumined as the sun,
Were "Christna, Buddha, Jesus, One in Three and Three in One."

Whilst wrapt in contemplation on this glorious scene, a Voice
Resounded through the air in words, "Rejoice! oh Child, rejoice,
For now the illustration of the second lesson given Prepares thee to receive yet higher, holier light from Heaven.

"Then higher turn thy gaze, and tell me now what meets thy view.
'I see a grander Being still, on clouds like sparkling dew,
So brilliantly the rainbow tints appear refracted there,
Like tens of million diamonds upon the sun-lit air.

"I see Him high above the Three, and from His Person flows
Unto them myriads of rays—each ray through them endows, Now North, now South, now East, now West, with light some hungry soul
To lighten on his darksome way, unto the brighter goal.

"And oh! His countenance is Love, and tenderness divine;
'I cannot spare one soul,' He says, 'for all, all, all, are Mine.'
Who is this Glorious Being? Who? Angel, I pray thee say; Interpret me this vision, that I fail not by the way."

"My Child, this Vision given is, to show the time is here,
When knowledge Spiritual shall flow throughout the earthly sphere;
Led on by Him, Whose mortal incarnations now are o'er,
Whose Spiritual power henceforth shall spread from shore to shore.

"Therefore in glory Spiritual is He portrayed to thee
With power radiating from Him to all humanity
Through these His Earthly Missions; but a type of others borne
On Earth, in pity to thy race, by That Exalted One.

"For all are His. To Him in trust, the Father's love has given
Thy planet to watch over, and to bring each Soul to Heaven;
And on His high Seraphic plane, no creedal bonds are known,
His Heart of Love embraces all—for are not all His own?

"More shall we have to say—but now restrain thou canst not bear;
We leave thee—but the Vision and the lesson ponder o'er;
And know these mighty truths we show, are not for thee alone;
To stir the hearts of many to receive them are they shown."

Then all was silent, all was o'er, that glorious Vision gone,
The golden light, the angel voice, and I was left alone.
Was it a dream? a reverie? or was it sterling gold
Of purer, brighter, truer ring, than Earth can o'er unfold?

THE "NEW DISPENSATION," OR "SECOND COMING."

Again retreating from the World, in peaceful solitude
Within my sacred chamber, where no presence may intrude
Of earthly mould, at that sweet hour of universal rest,
When Slumber throws her soothing mantle over every breast;

In thoughtful mood I laid me down, thankful the day was o'er
With all its duties, all its cares, and I was free once more:
Yes, free in thought, and free in soul, like caged bird set free,
To revel in the joys of unrestrained liberty.

"Alone!" I cried, "oh joy! alone!" "No, not alone, my Child."
Was it a voice I heard, or echo horn of fancy wild?
"No fancy wild, oh Mortal, for again we come to thee,
Again to teach thee Holy Truths for all humanity.

"Three lessons have we given thee, through visions glorious,
Three Truths of mighty import hast thou now received from us,
And yet another must thou learn, and yet another still,
For, know we are God's Messengers, His purpose to fulfil."

O'erawed I listened, then uprose, and lowly bent me down,
"Oh Angel Messenger," I prayed, "God's holy will be done,
And grant His humble handmaid grace to fittingly receive Those truths so precious to her race, He willest thee to give."

"Rise up, My Child, thy prayer is heard; now upward turn thine eyes;
What seest thou?" "I see our Angel Guardian in the skies;
A golden halo crowns His head, He stands on clouds of light,
Around, awaiting His commands, are countless spirits bright.

"Of every hue, of every clime, of every nation they,
Throughout the realms of Spirit Land, His gracious call obey,
For all acknowledge Him their Lord, now from Earthblindness free,
And gladly yield obedience to His supremacy.

"And lo! a Voice like sweetest music vibrates on my ear:
'My friends, I have assembled ye, God's high behests to hear;
Our Father sees the time is ripe that brighter light be given
To those on Earth, our brethren dear, through ye, already risen.

"As His Vicegerent now I speak, to ye He gives the power,
Communion free with those on Earth to open from this hour;
Go forth then, marshalled by Myself, I lead ye in His name
To execute His mission high, for Earth's redemption.

"Go, show yourselves by sight and sign, that living still are ye,
No more must doubt and fear encompass immortality;
God's fiat is gone forth, then hasten all ye to obey
In joy and gladness, for the mission given ye this day."

"All bow—and now that myriad host I see in order grand Move Northward, Southward, Eastward, Westward, each a mighty band;
And all with purpose high, intent their mission to fulfil,
With loving zeal to execute the Father's holy will.

"But now, a strange thing meets my gaze. Angel, I pray thee say,
What meaneth it that those whose hue betrays the burning ray
Of Eastern Sun, and Torrid Zone, Westward and Northward go, While those of fairer hue to Eastern, Southern countries flow?"

"My Child, herein the lesson is, thou now must learn this day,
And hence the Vision given, that to thee we may convey Its import high in characters clear as the noon-day sun,
Clear as God's holy will to us; and may that will be done.

"The Vision shown thee well portrays the grand reality
Of active work in Spirit realms, for Earth's humanity;
The 'Second Coming' of our Lord, in glory Spiritual
With all His angel messengers, God's bidding to fulfil.

"And as thou sawest spirits fly to countries not their own,
It is to show thee, that in Heaven, hearts not creeds are known,
Nor hue, nor clime. Ponder this o'er, my Child, I leave thee now,
And pray that Wisdom from on High may rest upon thy brow."

March 26th, 1885.

IV.

THE UNIVERSAL RELIGION.

Again upon the outer world, my chamber door I close
In peaceful joy that now no thought of Earth may interpose
Between me and my God: Or bar that sweet communion high
With those already gone before into Eternity.

And thus absorbed in deepest thought, I knelt in humble prayer
That He Whose Soul-enlightening presence permeates everywhere,
Might bless me with the Heavenly glow of His dear presence here,
With love and wisdom Spiritual my yearning heart to cheer.

And as I prayed, behold before my Vision now appear'd
A wondrous sight! A globe of large dimensions in the air:
Like Mother Earth to me it seemed, for on its surface fair,
Her continents and islands, seas and oceans pictured were.

And slowly it rotated, that my Vision might embrace
All countries in succession, every clime and every race.
What meaneth it? I asked, in mental query—when a sound
Like softest music met my ear, and made my heart rebound;

For well that Angel Voice I knew, that Voice of soothing love,
Like rippling waters of a stream, life's dewdrops from above;
Yea, dewdrops on a Soul athirst for living dew from Heaven,
Reviving it, renewing it, with its most precious leaven.

"My Child, no questions ask as yet, but watch in faith and see The gradual unfolding of this Vision given thee."
Such were the gracious words vouchsafed unto me, as I knelt
In humble attitude, and gazed in silent wonderment

Upon that moving sphere; when lo! encircling it I saw
A band of light; its brilliancy increasing more and more Unto the perfect day: and on that band, in words of gold,
Illumined as with glow of Heaven's rays, there was unrolled

That old familiar precept called "The Golden." Thus it ran:
"Love God with all your heart and soul, and love your brother man
As though yourself. In this the sum of all religion true, Throughout the Universe, God's law—most ancient—ever new."

"My Child," the Angel said, "thou seest now the reason why
That glorious 'Golden Rule' encircles all humanity
Of every country, every clime, embracing all in one,
One Universal Brotherhood—as God wills should be done.

"In previous lessons hast thou learnt, no creeds are known in Heaven,
God's 'Golden Rule' for every Soul, as on that band engraven,
Is all complete for time and age, for every race and nation,
Its simple grandeur reaches all, throughout His wide Creation.

"This lesson learn—and far and wide impart it, as the seal
And sum and substance of God's law, for Man's eternal weal
Whether in Earth or Heaven—yea, engraven must it be
On every heart aspiring to a blest Eternity.

"And this the Golden Message to be borne to every land
By those Angelic Messengers, who under God's command,
Led on by Jesus, our Lord, now visit Earth again,
His mighty Truths to propagate amongst their fellow-men.

"And now, my Child, once more adieu, each lesson ponder o'er;
The fifth has now been given thee—a precious, priceless store,
Entrusted to thy keeping—Oh, a faithful servant be,
And use them for God's Glory, and to serve humanity."

THE GREAT TRUTH OF SPIRITUALISM.

To many the demonstration of the certainty of a future life seems to be the great achievement of Spiritualism; and it is surely no small one. To establish as a known fact, what to the great body of philosophic thinkers in all times has been at best but an uncertain probability, is an immense acquisition in the field of human knowledge. It is one so great that it is no wonder that multitudes of men, and especially those accustomed to depend on the results of speculative inquiry quite as much as those who have received all their beliefs traditionally, should start back at so bold a claim, and refuse to concede it. This must for a time be pardoned to them, so long as they can plead imperfect acquaintance with the full nature and measure of the proof; yet only for a time, for the evidence when all seen lacks nothing of power to carry conviction. The doctrine of a future life now stands as truly on a "scientific basis" as any of the doctrines of natural science, and only awaits, as one by one these have awaited, the slow defeat and retirement of prejudice.

And yet, when one reflects, the demonstration of the bare fact of a future life, apart from all information respecting its nature, conditions, and connection with this life, would be a piece of knowledge of little value. Wherein could it help us? How incite, guide, or comfort us? Merely to know that a life of some sort awaits us; one on which perhaps the present has no bearing; one in which (as some confused dreamers seem to have imagined) our very personality might disappear, and which would, therefore, be no life to us,—of what use would this be?

Evidently the bare fact of a life beyond the present one is not the great truth of Spiritualism. Nor is it that deceased spirits can return to us, make known their continued individual existence, their essential identity of character, their unchanged affection for us and even their guidance to some extent of our steps. These truths, so far as they can be proved such—and they would seem to be well sustained in the experience of many—are very precious and inspiring. They have much of the power of the grand old doctrine of a Divine Providence in all the events of our lives, without its terrible difficulties, its often appalling, staggering aspects; for we have to defend no claim on the part of the ministering angels, of their omnipotence, omniscience or any infinite perfection. To have even the imperfect sympathy and guidance of those who, essentially like ourselves, have passed through our experiences into those which yet await us, and so would seem qualified to throw some light upon our way, and to send back some words of cheer and patience, this, if reasonably verified to us, is no trivial thing. Yet even this, in which multitudes have found unspeakable comfort, is not the great truth of Spiritualism.

We find this only when we come upon the certain and indissoluble connection of character here with destiny hereafter. This is, for practical purposes, the most important principle that any religion can teach. A religion or philosophy which does not emphasize it, whatever attractions it may possess, whatever consolations it may bestow, is little else than a beguiling deceit. As a guide or incentive to right living, it is well nigh worthless. If it allows this great principle to be set aside or even weakened by false theories, as, for instance, in respect to the nature of forgiveness, as is done by some conceptions of "the Christian scheme," it cripples itself sorely for all usefulness; nay, may make itself positively "the minister of sin." The Protestant sees this clearly enough in the old Romish contrivances of indulgences, dispensations, penances and masses for the soul's repose, and denounces them for their immoral tendency. Not less clearly does the thoughtful man, unfettered by ecclesiastical creeds, see the same in certain dogmas of vicarious sacrifice, of the substitution of penalty or the satisfaction of justice upon the innocent in place of the guilty, of imputed sin and imputed righteousness, and wonders not that the practice of the so-called "orthodox" should commonly fall so far below Christian ethical theories. Most of the world's religions, so far as they have been shaped by the cunning of men, have intertwined in their teachings this destructive heresy, viz., some serious modification or evasion of the great, unchangeable, necessary, moral law, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," and in so doing have paralysed much of their power. In offering this easy bribe for acceptance to millions of the weakly thinking, they have not only demoralised them, but they have repelled in great numbers profounder minds from all the proffered forms of religion, as they will long continue to do.

Not so Spiritualism. However obscure and unlearned many of its exponents may have been—certainly untrained in theology and philosophy most of them—is it not noticeable with what unanimity, the world over, they have escaped this grand mistake? They have not vitiated this cardinal principle of all rational moral government—that character is the only basis of the awards of the life to come, the only parent of destiny—by any evasion or qualification, latent or open, shrewd or shallow. How happens this? That these humble men and women, professing to be only the mouthpieces of more exalted minds in the world of spirits, have with almost one accord in all parts of the civilised world and in all its civilised languages taught one distinct, consistent, unmodified view binding the next life to this by the most absolute and indissoluble connection of character and destiny, as no religion known to them had done—is there not here a fact somewhat remarkable, one that calls for some adequate explanation? Does it not distinctly point to a source of their common sentiment quite above themselves, one which, however difficult it might be to verify in other ways, is by this alone strongly attested?

This, then, we pronounce to be the Great Truth of Spiritualism. It is practically by far its most valuable. No religion can contain one of more worth to mankind. It is one which every man, woman and child of rational years can understand, and one which every day and hour of their lives they have occasion to remember. However it may be obscured and practically denied by other forms of religious teaching, so long as it is uniformly and emphatically inculcated by those of the spirit-world, no one need ever ask, "What is the use of Spiritualism?"

And of all men, Spiritualists should be the last to discount the doctrine in their own practice.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

ERRATUM.—In Mr. Maitland's letter in last "LIGHT," page 341, column 1, 20th line from the bottom, for Scriptures read Scripture.

THE Editor of "LIGHT" will esteem it a favour on the part of any reader possessing an autograph letter of the late Mr. Serjeant Cox, if they will communicate with him, stating terms of sale, &c. It is required for the purpose of identifying handwriting. Address, Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Strand.

MR. COLVILLE'S ADDRESSES on Sunday last, at Cavendish Rooms, were well attended, and seemed to be greatly appreciated. His subjects on Sunday next will be, at 11 a.m., "The Woman Clothed with the Sun," and at 7 p.m. (by request), "The Great Pyramid of Egypt; who was its founder, and for what purpose was it built?"

MR. J. S. FARMER has received an application for permission to translate his "New Basis of Belief in Immortality" into the Swedish language. To this he has consented, and the translation will be forthwith proceeded with by the Rev. J. A. Dalen, the director of the Swedish Seaman's Mission at West Hartlepool. It will also be remembered that Count Schonfeldt, a brother of Prince Lichtenstein, has translated the same book into German. An application for its translation into French is also under consideration.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions: (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

- | | |
|---|---|
| A.—Mesmerism. | K.—Spirit Identity. |
| B.—Trance. | L.—Materialised Spirit Forms. |
| C.—Clairvoyance. | M.—The Spirit Rap. |
| D.—Thought-reading. | N.—The Spirit Voice. |
| E.—Previsional and Coincidental Dreams. | O.—Psychography. |
| F.—Apparitions. | P.—Automatic Writing. |
| G.—The Human "Double." | Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact. |
| H.—Presence at a Distance. | R.—Miscellaneous Phenomena. |
| I.—Haunted Houses. | |

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.]

CLASSES K. AND M.—SPIRIT IDENTITY AND THE SPIRIT RAP.

The following case of personal experience may be useful for public record, (1) as showing to commencing investigators under what unexpected circumstances genuine "raps" may be obtained; (2) as giving to advanced students a parallel to a somewhat rare case recorded by "M.A. (Oxon.);" in his "Spirit Identity," and proving that apparently spontaneous action may be really under the direction of some unknown agent.

On Thursday, January 25th, 1885, I was on a visit to a relative. The party there consisted (besides the heads of the family) of one son, three daughters, and two guests, Captain and Mrs. S. They were all quite ignorant of Spiritualism. The account of some of my experiences excited their curiosity, and an impromptu table séance was proposed. Knowing that personally I had no mediumship for causing or getting "raps," I expected nothing but the usual "playing" at a séance. The table, however, after some time, commenced tilting and giving messages. Experience having taught me that such tilting soon breeds an atmosphere of suspicion that some one is consciously or automatically pressing on the table, I asked if raps could be given. To the surprise of all, the answer was given by three faint yet distinct raps. By-and-bye these came clearer and precise, and answered with perfect intelligence, but never became louder than the drip of invisible drops of water right on the centre of the table, which sound they most closely resembled. By this means we learned that Mrs. S. was an extraordinary natural medium. The whole company were much excited by this success, and were anxious to give up every evening to the further investigation. Some notes I have by me, in my diary, give me the result of each evening. On Friday, the 26th, some two or three new persons, very sceptical, were present, and no raps, only tiltings, were obtained. On Saturday, the 27th, our first company were by themselves again, and raps were obtained. On Sunday, the 28th, we were again by ourselves, and raps were obtained alternated with tiltings. Five of the company were named by the unseen agencies as mediumistic, and were advised to form a "Holy Society of Mediums," and to sign that night an agreement between themselves to pray night and morning for one another, whereby their mediumship would be much helped. This was accordingly done. On Monday, the 29th, the raps, among other things, gave the following message, "Religion true hates not a living soul." In the morning at breakfast the conversation had turned on forgiveness—one of the company maintaining that it was theoretically good but practically impossible.

On Tuesday, the 30th, the conversation at breakfast turned upon the above message. One of the company noticed it made a verse, and we all tried to recollect where it was quoted from, but unsuccessfully. I then told the company of the case in ("M.A. Oxon's") "Spirit Identity," where a quotation given at a séance was afterwards curiously discovered as if by spirit direction, and I suggested that our spirits might likewise help us. No sitting was held that night, as we all went out, Captain S. and the son to investigate a materialisation séance given in the town, the rest of us to a party.

On Wednesday, 31st, Captain S., the son, and myself, went out to a public séance in the town. In the meanwhile the rest of the company—all ladies—being left to themselves, started a séance on their own account to test whether the raps were not a trick that I or Captain S. was playing on their credulity.

To their surprise the raps came, not, as before, gentle and peaceful, but loud like hammerings, and not only on the table but on the floor and the walls. They spelt out: "Knowles—spare room" (I think this was the name—my notes fail me as to it). They then ceased. Frightened, thinking this was some violent spirit haunting the spare bedroom, when we gentlemen arrived home late at night we found them all eagerly considering if any one of their acquaintances had borne this name. We were appealed to, but none of us could recollect such a person to satisfactorily account for his presence in that room. Just then one of the girls (one of the five mediums named by the spirits), recollecting that the gas had been left burning in the library (used by the family as a spare sitting-room), slipped out of the room without saying a word, to put it out. As she was doing so, her eye fell on a book in the shelves bearing the title, "Knowles' Poems." Struck by the coincidence of the name, she took down the book and opened it, haphazard, and there, somewhere in the middle of the book, her eye fell upon an illustration, and at the foot of it the line, "Religion true hates not a living soul." The next day the other visitors and myself left.

For the benefit of Spiritualists I will add the sequel of these experiences. Convinced by such startling evidence of spirit presence, my relatives were for a month most eager in declaring their conversion to Spiritualism. But their "pastor" and other well-meaning friends warned them to have nothing to do with Spiritualism, that it was a device of Satan and had been forbidden by the Bible. (N.B. The "spirit" breathed in the messages as to prayer and forgiveness weighs nothing with this class of thinkers. Such is only the "artfulness" of Satan.) Two of the family were ardent admirers of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, and asked their advice on the subject. Mr. Sankey, doubtless with good intention, warned them solemnly that no good came of it, and that from the experience of a certain friend of his he could say it led to insanity.

Consequently they withdrew from their agreement, and all connection with Spiritualism. Captain S. has gone on to investigate and has convinced himself of its truth. Mrs. S. has been rather shaken in her belief by clericals of Catholic and High Church schools of thought.

According to the requirements of the editor I enclose the names and addresses of all the sitters, but under the above-mentioned circumstances the readers will readily excuse my withholding all names from publication. But Captain S. (now in Africa) would, I am sure, for the benefit of science, be happy on his return to answer anyone wishing to communicate with him. I will therefore supply his address to anyone asking me.

OBSESSION (?).—M. Sauvaget writes to the Revue Spirite: A short distance from my house at St. George's live the widow Robert, seventy-two, and her son, thirty. Five years ago they complained to me about noises in their abode. I went and saw that it could not be intruded upon from without. The son said that his bedclothes were snatched off at night; kitchen utensils sounded as if they were beaten, thrown about and broken, but in the morning nothing appeared to account for the noises. I told them that such disturbances were sometimes caused by spiritual enemies; that God commanded the forgiving of our enemies; that whomsoever may have offended them, or have been offended by them, they should forgive from the bottom of their hearts, and pray them to do the same. A week after they told me that the noises, &c., had ceased. A month later the son was had up before the magistrates for assaulting a neighbour. The nocturnal disturbances were renewed. At the end of a year the son married; but his wife left him on account of his bad conduct. The noises, which had abated, were renewed. The old mother, going out with her basket, would walk about for hours, fatiguing herself; she said she could not help it, that she felt as if pushed and made to do so. The son says that he is under a spell, that he sees four men who want to strangle him. A physician certifies that he is out of his mind, and arrangements are being made to send him to the lunatic asylum at Rochelle.

REVIEW.

THE VIRGIN OF THE WORLD, of Hermes Mercurius Trismegistus, now first rendered into English, with Essay, Introductions and Notes, by Dr. Anna Kingsford and Edward Maitland, authors of "The Perfect Way." May be obtained from the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross. 10s. 6d.

The title of this work, which is produced under the auspices of the Hermetic Society, is in reality applicable only to about one-third of the ancient matter which it contains. The remainder consists of five other Hermetic treatises, viz., Asclepius, The Definitions of Asclepius, Hermes to his son Tatios, Hermes to Ammon, and short fragments rescued from various sources. These are truly kindred works, parts of one whole, and our remarks may be taken as referring indifferently to any or all of them.

It would be impossible, within the limits of this notice, to give even a succinct résumé of the multifarious contents of these remarkable productions, and the curious student who desires to dive into their mysteries must resort to the book itself for that information which it alone can give him. Suffice it to say that, under the cloak of an external doctrine, it is generally conceded (indeed the work claims this for itself) that there runs through the whole an esoteric meaning. This will be no secret to the true philosopher, to whom every outward being, act and system is significant of inner entity, life, and doctrine. Hence, whether the claim has or has not been made in any particular instance—if the basis be a true one, it may be held to be justified. The works under review, then (great as may be their interest, regarded as expositions of a phase of ancient historic, scientific and metaphysic teaching), will be more deeply appreciated by many, as veiling, under these external forms, an occult doctrine concerning the genesis, fortunes, and destiny of the soul, under the title of a Virgin.

These treatises are generally supposed to have been the product of that remarkable period of spiritual and intellectual activity which focussed itself at Alexandria in the earlier centuries of our era. Though attributed to the mythic Hermes Trismegistus, their authorship is unknown; but whatever elements of the thought of the time they may contain, there appears to be a strong infusion of the primitive religious and philosophic teaching of that earlier Egypt which was then becoming embalmed in a mummified form. The thought and the phraseology are those of the science and metaphysics of a long-past age, sometimes crude in conception, and elementary in form: embodying certain broad generalisations of truth, rather than minutely accurate presentations of it, of which that age was incapable. Equally elementary and general, then, must be the mystic meaning into which the instructed reader would translate them.

Some there are in these days of the opening of the spiritual philosophy and the secret science of other times and other peoples, of almost forgotten dates, to the gaze of the Western world, who, moved by a very natural reaction from the forward rush of modern thought, are in danger of attaching too exclusive a value to the teachings of antiquity; and who, falling on their knees to worship its wisdom, close their ears to the voices of their own age. This reaction is inevitable, and prompts a profound searching into the lore of the past on the part of its enthusiastic votaries. While this is likely, in its way, to be productive of much general good, the wise will ever strive to preserve a just equipoise in their judgments, remembering that "there be many voices in the world, and none of them is without understanding," and, like the bee, will, with skillful discrimination, suck honey from every wholesome flower. In the present work, as in most others of its class, the thoughtful student will often be delighted to detect, amid things that are crude and obsolete, many evidences of deep flashes of insight, gems of wisdom, which he will lovingly peruse and carefully treasure. And he will realise that over all there reigns an intense seriousness, a devout reverence, a noble dignity of thought and expression, well fitted to reprove and correct the cynical indifference, the conceit, and the forward disrespect which are sadly too prevalent in our own time. These books are entirely wholesome, treating, as they do, upon matters of the greatest pith and significance, in a spirit of love and wisdom, whose daughter is Peace; and our thanks are due to both the translators and the enterprising publisher for enabling the English reading public for the first time to peruse in our own tongue these rare legacies from the Old World.

As to the execution of the work, nothing but praise is to be accorded to all who have been engaged in its publication. The style of the translation is admirable, and this affords some guarantee that the rendering from the intermediate French original is faithful. The three introductory essays also are choicely written and are very instructive; and the typography of the book is most pleasant to read. One improvement there might have been—and, if a second edition should be called for, we hope it will be made—by furnishing a complete explanation of the fifteen excellently engraved symbolic illustrations which appropriately ornament the volume.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

J. W. WILSON.—We are indebted to you for the cutting from the Secular Review.

GEORGE PEDDLE.—By all means send us the newspaper-cutting referring to a haunted house. Such extracts are always useful to us even though you may not see the result in "LIGHT" immediately.

A Correspondent who marks his letter "Private" (and we therefore give no initials or other marks of identification) writes: "To-day's 'LIGHT' has come to me. Instead of facts and discussions concerning Spiritualism, there is little else than attacks on the Christian religion. It is simply disgusting, and—on your (the italics are not ours) part—idiotic." We suppose our correspondent refers to Mr. Maitland's letter on "The Historic Jesus." If so, he is, we think, mistaken in regarding it as an attack on Christianity. As a matter of fact, we believe both the disputants in this controversy (which we deprecated from the first as likely to lead to theological bitterness) acknowledge the value and beauty of the Christian doctrine; the points of difference arise from the fact that they look at the question from different aspects. At the same time we cannot but regret the tone of our correspondent's letter. The controversy arose out of a report of a meeting which appeared in these columns, and in the interests of free inquiry we could not well refuse letters on this subject. Our correspondent, if he will examine last week's "LIGHT" again, will see that the facts do not bear out his assertion as to their being "little else than attacks on the Christian religion" in place of "facts and discussions concerning Spiritualism." Mr. Maitland's letter occupied three columns out of the twenty allotted to literary matter, all the rest of the space being devoted to matters of general interest to Spiritualists.

INDEPENDENT WRITING.—The Spiritual Offering, June 20th, has the following: "During the winter a circle was formed here for investigation; raps soon came. Then one of the circle obtained writing on a slate. To meet objections the circle was directed by raps to put the slate in a closet in the wall at the back of the medium; the slate was brought out with messages written on it. Last night Mr. Walser brought a new slate, and on this, placed in the closet, the medium, Dr. Bouton, sitting with the circle outside in the well-lighted room, twenty persons being present, writing was found, after raps were heard. The writing was 'Friend Stewart, I endeavoured to make my influence felt and known to you in your debate with Braden. You are doing a great work; keep on and be brave in it.—Yours, D. M. Bennett.' The writing refers to a discussion I have had with one, Mr. Braden. The writing has been compared with that in letters from D. M. Bennett during his earth-life, and it is, with signature, identical.—C. W. STEWART, Liberal, Mo., June 5th."

THE action of a man's mind is not always essential in the transmission of his magnetism curatively, nor the mental state, called faith, always essential on the part of the patient. Once, after lecturing at Waltham, Mass., circumstances required that I should sleep by the side of the father of my hostess, Mrs. Lincoln, who told me that he was an invalid, but not likely to disturb me. When I retired he was asleep, and when I woke he was gone. A year afterwards I met Mrs. Lincoln, and she told me that her father was quite well, and felt grateful to me for his cure. I did not understand. She then said that he came downstairs early, after my being his bedfellow, and said that he had been kept awake a good deal by my working my elbow against his lame back; but, strange to say, he was feeling a vast deal better of what had been a long trouble to him. She said that he got well from that time, and kept so. Any action from me upon him was an unconscious one. My understanding of the matter is this, that my arm was controlled by a spirit, and that the invalid was cured by a spirit's magnetism blending with my own, and transmitted through my physical system. Certainly there was no action of will on my part, any more than any action of faith on his, for he would have got away from the pressings of my elbow if he could.—PROFESSOR CAWELL, in "Facts."

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXVII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Whitehall Review is doing good work for us, and for itself, no doubt, in giving clear accounts of psychographic manifestations with Mr. Eglinton. For example, a gentleman writes that he went with his mother and sister to Mr. Eglinton with their own slates, thoroughly secured and held by themselves. No trick—no fraud—was possible, and they got entirely satisfactory written communications from their spirit friends. Such facts, in respect to Mr. Eglinton alone, can now be proven by hundreds of witnesses. Better, for some, than that any one can have the evidence of his own senses.

Mr. Wallace, the naturalist, puts the matter very clearly. He says that no fact in nature has any better evidence than spirit manifestations—that is, that under favouring conditions, unknown forces, guided by intelligence, produce sensible, audible, visible manifestations. That the intelligence guiding the force is some one we know in this life, some dear friend or near relation, is as well proven as such a fact can be.

The Ohio lawyer, Mr. Beoto, counsel for Mr. Mott, a medium prosecuted for fraud, said: "I do not mean to enter into the question of whether Mr. Mott is right or wrong in his belief; that is something which each one must decide for himself and which is not affected by any of the issues pertaining to this case. I will only say that the whole world, or a portion of it at least, has agreed for many years that conversation and verbal communication with the spirits of the dead is not an impossibility. Let scepticism say what it may; let incredulity speak as loud as it will, the fact still remains that numbers of the most reputable men of this country are firm believers in the faith of which Mr. Mott, the defendant, is an exponent."

It may be said that the belief of any number of men in a religion, for example, does not prove it true—that there are hundreds of millions of Buddhists, Mahomedans, Roman Catholics, &c., who believe in their respective creeds. Yes; but it is not a question of a belief in certain doctrines, or even in things said to have happened centuries ago; but in actual, recent, present facts seen, heard, and felt by thousands. Of the miracles recorded in the Bible, for instance, men may say, I believe them because they are written. Of the facts of Spiritualism thousands of living men and women can say, I know them to be true by the evidence of my own senses.

Here is a bit of testimony in a letter to the editor of the Whitehall Review: "Then came a test that would have satisfied even you. I lashed the two slates as before together, having previously cleaned the slates and asked another question, and put in the same crumb of pencil. Mr. Eglinton then held the slate high up on the table with one hand, and my sister held the other end. Longer time was taken now before an answer came, and Mr. Eglinton seemed much distressed. In about two minutes the pencil began writing and, as before, suddenly stopped. I opened the slates and there was a distinct answer to my question, written on closed and tied slates, held in the air by my sister as well as Mr. Eglinton. I have the slates still tied (I retied them) and fastened in a parcel, and shall be glad to show them to you in September when I shall be in London."

Word and Work of June 13th leads off its pages with a paper on "Modern Miracles," fully admitting the verity of the Roman Catholic miracles of healing as "duly vouched by medical testimony at Lourdes, at Knock, and especially those of Father Mathew, the temperance reformer, and of the famous Prince Hohenlohe, who among hundreds of cases in Europe and America, cured in 1822 King Louis of Bavaria of deafness."

Here are two cases, reported by Professor Onymus, of the University of Wurzburg: "A man of about fifty, named Brandal, caused himself to be carried by six men from Carlstadt to the Court at Stauffenburg. His arms and legs were entirely paralysed, hanging like those of a dead man, and his face was of a corpse-like pallor. On the prayer of the Prince he was instantly cured, rose to his feet, and walked perfectly, to the profound astonishment of all present. A student of Burglauer, near Marmerstadt, had lost for two years the use of his legs; he was brought in a carriage, and though he was only partially relieved by a first and second prayer of the Prince, at the third he found himself perfectly well. Similar instances, fairly authenticated, might be multiplied manifold. Yet in presence of these our sturdy Protestantism refuses to acknowledge one single unscriptural dogma which the Church of Rome teaches."

But if the miracles recorded in the Bible attested the truth of its doctrines, why not now? If people believed "because they saw the mighty works" wrought eighteen centuries ago, why not to-day? The logic seems lame—but the facts are what I am most concerned about.

Curiously enough, Word and Work, while endorsing modern miracles as undoubted facts, pours a bucket of cold water over the "Faith-healing of to-day." These cures, it says, are worked by "the power of expectation. It matters little what determines this expectation; only let it be present in full force, and in certain cases a cure follows. We have ourselves seen repeatedly the powerful effect of substances altogether inert upon patients who had been persuaded to believe them efficacious. How far the mind can act upon the body for good or ill has not yet been exactly determined. There can, however, be no doubt that in a very large number of cases an expectation of recovery, which may, in a certain sense, be called faith, contributes in no small degree to the desired result. This, let it be noted, is not faith in God, but faith in the process, whether it be anointing or laying on of hands or the action of some vaunted remedial drug."

Yes; but why does not this explanation apply equally to miracles of healing two thousand years ago? And it is also to be observed that no such theory can be applied to the greater part of the miracles of Spiritualism. Expectation cannot cause a message to be written between two slates, solidly fastened together, held in your hands, sealed up in paper, &c. Expectation will not produce materialisation. Expectation will not put on a man's wrist an iron ring which cannot be passed over his hand. Expectation cannot tie knots in an endless cord, nor thread a chain on my arm while I am holding another person's hand.

No. Solid miracles like these cannot be attributed to expectation or belief. The facts, as thoroughly attested as any facts can be, examined, tested, and attested by men of science, admit of no such explanation, as they admit of no denial, contrary as they may be to all the "well-known laws of nature"—there they are—solid, undeniable facts, from which there is no escape, and which must leave their influence.

No escape, friends! Christian or Agnostic, you cannot get away from a fact. There it stands, a solid diamond rock amid the billows of speculation or emotion. Ignore or deny it, there it is, ready to smash your theories to atoms. A fact is some thing you cannot get round, or over, or through.

So I say to all Spiritualists—gather your facts, record your facts, marshal your facts. They are your impregnable fortress, and they are equally your resistless artillery. No theory—no system can stand against facts. Principles must harmonise with facts. Facts give us principles.

PROGRESS.—It is two hundred years ago that, in obedience to an Old Testament injunction, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," women were put to death in New England. Rebecca Nurse was the last victim, at sixty-one years of age. She was hanged, as a witch, at Salem, Massachusetts, in 1692. Her descendants have erected a monument over her grave, with a poetical tribute to her memory from the pen of Whittier.—Spiritual Offering.

INTELLIGENCE IN ANIMALS.—As a train conveying a menagerie approached Danbury, Conn., the axle of one of the elephants' cars broke, and tilting, yielded to the weight of the elephant in it, and he slid out; other cars were thrown off the track to the alarm of their elephantine passengers, who made the country resound with their trumpeting. After vain efforts to get the cars on the rails the keeper invited the co-operation of four of the most intelligent of his elephants; they soon comprehended what was wanted of them, and after a short deliberation, they set to work together and successively replaced the cars on the rails.—Review Spirit.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zollner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Conson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstübbe, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMBERTUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1883), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and conscientious, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1882.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this. What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

GEORGE F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them; but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of anylegerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitations. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Esclapart de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (tout de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

ROBERT HOUDIN.

"4th May, 1847.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux)."

I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Mengens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the physical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances is absolutely impossible. It must by any reference to prestidigitations be absolutely impossible. I must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The Historic Jesus.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Though sympathising with your desire to close the discussion on this subject, I must nevertheless ask to be allowed to make a brief reply to some of the statements contained in this week's "LIGHT."

To take first the letter of Dr. Wyld. The epithets to which he objects applied not to himself, but to his style and argument. If flat contradiction in a matter such as that under treatment is not "discourteous," then, and then only, was I not justified in using the term. I believe, however, that I was justified in using it. Thus much as to the style.

With regard to the argument—to which I applied the other terms complained of—if to use an argument to another which does not satisfy oneself—as, for instance, Dr. Wyld's argument from majorities, which he certainly does not regard as sound in regard to things spiritual—is not to be "flippant, superficial, and insincere," then, and then only, was I wrong in using those terms. As it is, I hold that I am justified by the facts of the case. Dr. Wyld replied to me by an argument which, he well knows, has no weight with himself.

Dr. Wyld's veneration for the "beloved disciple" cannot exceed mine. But the question between us is, not what that disciple wrote, but what was his meaning. Dr. Wyld in his present letter simply reiterates the expression before employed in order to stigmatise us as "false prophets," without taking the smallest notice of my suggested explanation of the meaning of the phrase "Come in the flesh"—thereby aggravating his original fault. We maintain no less strenuously than Dr. Wyld himself that "Jesus Christ has come in the flesh," and by that coming inaugurated the Christian dispensation. But we differ from Dr. Wyld as to the modus of the coming, and believe that our view is the true one, and that which the "beloved disciple" himself intended.

Dr. Wyld's persistent substitution of the word "mythical" for "mystical"—which I used—is, I hope, due to accident rather than design, for the perversion involves a serious misrepresentation. It is, however, clear from his remarks on the Miraculous Conception that his own view of what is implied in that event is neither mythical nor mystical, but materialistic; and that as, for him, "Christ Jesus" denotes, not Man regenerate and purely spiritual, but a physical and historical personality; so "Virgin Mary" denotes, not the human soul become pure and fit to be the "mother" of such "Man regenerate," but a physical and historical personality. But perhaps Dr. Wyld is of those for whom Adam and Eve and the serpent are "historical" personages. If so, it is no wonder that he falls foul of us who hold that the Bible teaches by means of parables which, referring to things spiritual and in perpetual course of enactment, are not "historical," but true for all time. It is precisely the insistence on the materialistic, because historical, view that has wrought havoc with Christianity and even with religion itself.

I cannot but regard Dr. Wyld's allusion to what he considers the exposure of "Koot Hoomi" as unfortunate for his case. If only by showing how easily a fictitious personage may come to be accepted as a real one, the history in question is suggestive in a direction the very opposite to that which Dr. Wyld would approve. Concerning the case itself I pronounce no opinion. But concerning the spirit in which Dr. Wyld has dealt with it I have a decided opinion, and find it not difficult to believe that had he lived—as perhaps he did—some eighteen centuries ago, the "pretensions" of a certain other personage, also intimately associated with "a tree," would have found in him an equally scornful repudiation.

If I have indeed "somewhat overstepped bounds" in alluding

"We have inserted as many letters on the subject of 'The Historic Jesus' as we could find space for. The correspondence must now, in accordance with our intimation, cease."

to Dr. Wyld's admissions in past years, I am sorry for it. But I alluded only to what he has said repeatedly and before others, and was in no sense private, but has since been borne out by his own published letters. If Dr. Wyld can say the same of the remarkable utterance he ascribes to me, I shall be content to incur the reproach due. This, however, I know that he cannot do; for, whatever may have been the remarks on which he bases his statement, they were certainly not as he represents them; first, because, however high I may believe to be the authority for the doctrine of re-births, it is contrary to my practice to rest any doctrine on authority, and still less to advance pretentious personal claims; and next, because the expression, "forsaken of the Gods," would imply my belief in a previous enjoyment by him of Divine communion; and happy as I should be to credit Dr. Wyld with so high a privilege, he has yet to furnish the grounds which would justify me in doing so. But it may be after all that the solution of our difference here is to be found in the proverbial difficulty which persons of Dr. Wyld's nationality are said to have in apprehending a joke.

I do not care to contemplate a harsher explanation of Dr. Wyld's mistake in this matter, but am content to ascribe it to some defect either of apprehension or of recollection, and would therefore remind him that, however positive he may feel about his accuracy, all that he can possibly be sure of is his own belief as to what passed on the occasion or occasions to which he refers.

One word of thanks to Madame de Steiger for her excellent letter. She is indeed right, it seems to me, in her reprobation of those who, in their determination to have their human God, have caused Christianity to be discredited, and seriously endangered the whole fabric of religion.

It is impossible for me to deal here otherwise than very cursorily with Miss Campbell's elaborate disquisition. I will therefore content myself with indicating a few of its salient points, as a means to a judgment of the whole.

1. Miss Campbell has sadly mistaken both the scope and spirit of my remarks. For those who, being sincere in their beliefs, defend them by sincere arguments, and even if mistaken have taken pains to learn, I have nothing but respect, no matter what their beliefs are, and to such as these my strictures bore no reference. It was to a particular line of argument, employed by a particular person, that I applied the terms she resents, and her application of them to the whole body of those who share the same views is at once unjust and unjustifiable.

2. So far from my interpretation of Mark iii. being "astounding," it is the obvious and only one possible. The word, v. 21, translated "friends," means undoubtedly, says the learned Dean Alford in his scholarly work on the Greek Testament, "relations," "for the sense is resumed, v. 31, by the word, φίλοι"—therefore. Moreover, his note is headed "Charges against Jesus of madness by His relations;" and the text expressly specifies His mother as one of those concerned.

3. After saying she "has never read the works of scholars either on one side or the other," but will "simply let the Gospels speak for themselves," Miss Campbell proceeds to set forth, not at all what the Gospels say,—namely, that Mary, as cousin to Elizabeth, who was of the house of Aaron, must have belonged to the tribe of Levi, and was not therefore of the house of David,—but what "Roman Catholics are taught in their earliest lessons" by their priests, and is rested by them, not on the Gospels, but on a tradition in apparent discordance with the Gospels!

Does not my fair, and doubtless amiable, though somewhat impetuous, opponent see that even if her letter does not call for the particular epithets by which I characterised that of Dr. Wyld, there are yet others which might be used, of a scarcely less favourable nature? The most fervent faith and zeal cannot afford to dispense with accuracy of statement and logical coherence. She seems to regard her acknowledged want of study, which means want of knowledge, as a positive qualification for the task of defending her religious convictions. But how if such rule were applied to the discussion of other subjects as, for instance, chemistry or astronomy? Would she not consider as guilty of something not very unlike "presumption" the novice who, "having never read the works of scholars on one side or the other," should undertake to contradict off-hand those who had devoted years to earnest investigation?

If, as I suspect, Miss Campbell thinks the presumption is ours, for declining to accept the sacerdotal presentation of these matters, I would refer her again to her Bible, where, as she will find, it is always the priests who, alike in Old Testament and New, incur the Divine reprobation for precisely the degradation of doctrine from which we are endeavouring to rescue Christianity. If she can show that the prophets are against us we shall indeed be answered. But we know and respect the Bible far too well to take our interpretation of things spiritual from any body of priests. Does she suppose that the sacerdotal character has changed since the days of Caiaphas?

Miss Campbell's closing remark that "it is quite open to doubt the mystic sense of the Gospel," shows that she has yet much to learn of her own religion before she is qualified to take part in this controversy. If the Jesus of the Gospels was indeed an historical character, then must His mother have been one likewise. Is it, then, such a character that the Church contemplates when, in its offices of the B. V. M., it puts into her mouth the words—"I dwell in the highest: and my throne is on the pillar of the clouds. I made an unfailing light to arise in heaven: And, as a mist, I overspread the whole earth"? Or when it says of her—"The Lord Himself created her in the Holy Ghost: and poured her out among all His works"? And declares, further, that "the Virgin Mary was taken up to the Heavenly chamber, where the King of Kings sits on His starry throne"? To us who accept her as a symbol of the soul, universal or individual, and at once Divine and human, these utterances are intelligible and true. But they represent the mystic sense of the Gospel, and therefore, for your correspondent, though a Catholic, are "quite open to doubt," and the only sense that is imperative is that which, by applying them to an historical personality, makes them something worse than nonsense.

In reference to the "correspondent" whom you answer at such length, I would add to your answer these two remarks—(1) That a careful examination of the subject would show him that so far from "attacking Christianity" we are doing the one thing that can rescue and save Christianity—namely, restoring to it its spiritual sense. And (2) that the course he proposes to you in the conduct of your paper would be not only "idiotic," but unjust and illogical. "LIGHT" is described on its title-page as a "Journal of Psychical, Occult, and Mystical Research." So that in demanding—as I understand—that it should deal exclusively with things spiritualistic, he demands that it should omit the whole of the subjects it professes to treat saving only a particular department of one of them—Spiritualism being defined as a department of Occultism. It is only recently that you deprecated the establishment of a rival magazine, on the ground that "LIGHT" suffices to meet existing requirements. I feel tolerably confident that were you to do as your correspondent suggests, and exclude the classes of subjects to which he objects, it would very speedily be found that another paper of the kind would really be indispensable.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD MAITLAND.

SIR,—I have been much interested in the correspondence recently carried on in your columns entitled, "The Historic Jesus." I have no desire to traverse the whole subject, but should like to point out to C. C. Campbell and others that it is evident that neither Matthew nor Luke accepted the doctrine of the Miraculous Conception, or they would, in giving us their genealogies, have given that of Mary; this they have not done. They were both very careful to prove that Jesus came from the loins of David, and from the seed of Abraham, so they traced him in unbroken line, apparently, which went to establish two claims made by the followers of Jesus, viz., the identity of Jesus with the promised Messiah, and the fulfilment of prophecy in respect of his descent. But immediately the doctrine of the Miraculous Conception is introduced, these genealogies become meaningless; they prove nothing, and point to nothing, and being contradictory are terribly in the way; their authors sought to show the lineal descent of Jesus from Abraham and David, and in making the attempt have failed. This is the logical position of those who accept the doctrine of the Miraculous Conception, which seriously conflicts with another and even more cardinal doctrine of Christianity, viz., that of the Inspiration of the New Testament.

I will not seek further to trespass on your valuable space, or I would give your correspondent some references respecting the lineage of Mary.—I am, sir, yours truly,
Winchester, July 26th, 1885. GEO. BARTER.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It seems to me that if the Hermetic Society is to be taken at its word, according to its exponents (for they will not allow us to call them "leaders"), all should hasten to join that ecstatic community, and become mystics like themselves, for we are told by one lady, "There are no re-births any more for the soul that has found Christ Jesus," while, probably with the same dip of ink (we need not say "breath," as that might get us into a new difficulty), that lady tells us, "Jesus Christ comes in the flesh when He is incarnate in man, and this is the way He comes to all mystics."

Another lady of the same enthusiastic band expresses herself as "thankful to feel that, after all, their wings are safe." While a gentleman of the same happy family delivered himself thus to Dr. Wyld: "The views I hold come from the highest Divine fountain of all truth, and if you do not accept them you must be a man forsaken of the Gods." How glad some would be to believe this, if men, or even ladies, were to be always thoroughly confided in! That gentleman may believe this himself, but where are his proofs? As things are, what evidence have we that his is not a new groundless assumption?

"There is no salvation out of the Church of Rome" we have been told these many years, but I, for one, do not believe it, though it is grounded by a far greater weight of testimony from great and good men than this new version of Hermetic teaching.

Some, too, have whispered, "New presbyter is old priest writ large," and the opinion of the Calvinist has been expounded thus: "Many are called but few chosen; I am among that happy lot." But here are the Hermetic exponents assuring us that the blessings of salvation come to all mystics. On this point they are quite equal to the Salvation Army. What an enlargement of the old lines! What a delightfully broad interpretation! Who would not be a mystic if he could be so conscientiously! If he could abandon facts and take up with myths, which, indeed, he must do if he would be one of these new enthusiasts. For a prominent mystic exponent, who demurs to the term "leader," tells us: "No man can know any fact"; "Man is incompetent to know facts." How is this, Mr. Editor? In the very next number of your valuable journal you head an article thus, "Facts are Chiefs that winna ding." And thus it is, these new mystics utterly ignore, and would knock away, the whole fabric on which Modern Spiritualism hangs, which is founded on facts. And yet, when it suits their purpose, these Hermetic exponents stick to facts like other people. Is it, then, a fact that Mr. Maitland's views come from the highest Divine fountain? If he denies facts, like his president, he stultifies himself by such an observation, and surely can find no fault with those who believe in Spiritualistic facts being in accord with such stultification.

WM. R. TOMLINSON.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—In the article quoted by you from your contemporary, the Chicago Religio, the great truth of Spiritualism is said to be "the certain and indissoluble connection of character here with destiny hereafter." This, it is claimed, Spiritualism has evidenced in the reiterations of spirits who communicate to us from the other world. However much the manifesting intelligences differ upon other points they are agreed here, "that character is the only basis of the awards of the life to come, the only parent of destiny." This is an important "fact," the value of which cannot be over-estimated. Admitting the truth of the statement I feel inclined to ask why all this war of words and bitterness of feeling in respect to the ideal or real (historic) Jesus? The Man or mystical "Christ"? Whether real or mystical, historical or symbolical, in any case, the characteristics set forth are identical, viz., the necessity that each one of us should live pure lives, animated by pure and unselfish purposes, and practically emulate the Exemplar by "going about doing good," in the sweet, gentle, earnest, and true love for our ignorant and suffering kind, forgetful of self in the love and sympathy we bear to others.

Are we doing this? Are we building such characters by the devoted efforts we make to practically embody this law of love in our daily lives and zealously aim to achieve the ideal in our own experience?

When I know that I must work out my own salvation, learn patience, endurance, and gain strength through effort and enterprise for the good of my fellows, what matters it to me, whether one or other, the symbolic or historic, view of Jesus be correct? I can neither prove nor disprove, but, one way or the other, this I know, I must live my own life, be myself, be held accountable for the motive and "deeds done in the body," go to "my own place," not for what I have believed, or doubted, respecting Jesus, but for the seed sown, the influences exerted by me, the example I have set to my fellows.

"For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

Have we as Spiritualists, I ask in all solemn seriousness, and conscious that the answer my own conscience gives is not altogether satisfactory, realised to the full the significance of the demand Spiritualism makes upon us to do practical work for human progress by individual sacrifice of self and united effort? Have we not been trying to get more and more light, looking to our own needs, like the horse leech demanding more and more, without giving in return unstintingly to others around us? Have we preached these glad tidings, gone forth into all the world to tell them to every creature, regardless of discomfort and opposition? St. Paul was a fanatic, perhaps, but he was in earnest, and meant what he said; his philosophy did not cool his ardour for human salvation, he felt he must pluck men "as brands from the burning." "Now was the time," but he went to work at it so successfully that, although persecuted to the death, he made a mark which will live as long as Duty is recognised by man.

Have we wiped the tears from the mourner's eye? Have we fed the hungry, clothed the naked, healed the sick, sympathised with the suffering, warned the wayward, helped the weary, and comforted the heavy laden?

"The people die for lack of knowledge." We Spiritualists say we have the knowledge which will and must save, save from ignorance, fear, intemperance, selfishness, and wrong-doing. Why then are we spending our strength and cudgelling our brains, fighting with each other about symbols, interpretations, occult mysticisms, and poring over the wisdom of the ancients, which when interpreted means no more than is found in the spirit of the age, viz., that man is a spiritual being, a moral and responsible agent, that virtue, goodness, and obedience to the promptings of benevolence (self-sacrifice), and a life of purity, justice, and righteousness, bring with them the inevitable reward of growth in spirit, goodness, and power, peace and sweetness? The "blessedness" which is higher than happiness (gratification) comes alone to those who have overcome selfishness, and, in love, lived for others. Exactly so the contrary of these bring consequences of pain and deprivation. The only passport into the higher spheres is that of a rounded character, built up by daily endeavours to know and do the right, to be good and do good, and leave the world sweeter for our having grown and blossomed in it.

How can we practically realise this? Surely not by secluding ourselves from the world, not by talking a language of esoteric jugglery with symbolic expressions that none but Adepts can understand, which serve to obscure and not reveal the truth.

Let us have plain terms for plain facts. Let us overcome indifference by earnestness, hypocrisy by honesty, and faithlessness by fanaticism if need be. Character, not creed; deeds, not words. Empty boasters are we unless we can apply our Spiritualism with its mighty revelations of immortality and destiny to the daily life of humanity. Abstract philosophical disquisitions will not educate the children of the age, will not feed their minds with practical truth, moral culture, or warn them of dangers and vices that beset their paths. Let us not clutch at the shadow of wisdom and lose the substance of truth and duty. Wisdom is justified of her children when they prove themselves hers by wise employment of knowledge, in treading the path of duty, right, and love.

The spirits, with trumpet tongues, tell us over and over again—go to work—sow the seeds—spread the truth—let the light shine—life is for use, not for self, but for humanity and the truth. Learn it, love it, live it!!!

For myself, as I go through life I see so much of fear, fraud, and folly, so much of ignorance and wrong, that I feel amazed that people can spend their time bothering over what somebody, who lived (or did not live), somewhere or some time, meant by a phrase, a symbol, or an allegory he is said to have uttered, as though their very existence and the happiness here and hereafter of mankind depended upon getting at the bottom of the mystery, while starvation, disease, degradation, and death abound everywhere around them. Possibly when discovered the teacher meant no more, the truth behind the symbol was none other than the command, "Help, comfort, and bless your fellows, do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God."

Is there not need for "physical salvation" for the suffering, dejected, and degraded men and women, and depraved children around us, depraved because of the vice in which they were begotten? Should not this work be made better, brighter, and happier by right-doing and lovingkindness?

Cannot Spiritualism supply a moral force which shall lift humanity upon a higher, holier, and more harmonious plane of thought and life? Is there no practical way in which the golden rule of Spiritualism—"character here the parent of destiny hereafter"—can be applied to the building of a nobler character for ourselves, by self-knowledge, self-culture, and self-conquest, first, that we may become teachers by example and influence as well as by precept from Press and platform? These are questions of vital import for us to consider. We may sneer at the zeal of the Salvation Army, but it is doubtful to my mind whether it is not doing a more practical work for human advancement here, and consequently for a more blessed hereafter, than our "dry-as-dust" intellectual and theologic Spiritualism. The "head" without the heart is dead, has neither warmth, love, nor soul. We must put the "hearts" of love and sympathy into our Spiritualism, and "go out into the highways and byways and compel them to come in," if we would be alive and indeed even profit by the story of a Jesus, whether real or ideal.—Yours sincerely,

E. W. WALLIS.

SIR,—In Mr. Maitland's letter which appears in "LIGHT," No. 237, there is much that calls for reply, but without going into the whole question I should like to ask him where he discovered that the Evangelists disagree as to the day of the Crucifixion. I find on referring to the Greek Testament that each of the four Evangelists states that Christ was crucified on the day of preparation, namely, the day immediately preceding the great Passover Sabbath. Again, I should like him to show how the visit of the Magi contradicts the presentation in the Temple. St. Matthew neither states where nor when the Magi visited the young Child. He does say, however, that they came to Jerusalem, and stated that they had seen His star in the East, the same star which may have guided them to Nazareth, though the priests had directed them to Bethlehem. They came from the East, and though the place is not named, it may be readily supposed that they did not arrive in Jerusalem till some months after having seen the star. This is further to be supposed from the slaughter by Herod of children of two years old after having carefully inquired as to the time when the star had appeared. There is nothing in this account which in any way contradicts the account given in Luke's Gospel. Neither is there any statement in any of the Gospels which can be taken to mean that the parents of Jesus went up to Jerusalem every year from the time of His birth to His twelfth year. Like the Jews generally, they were in the habit of doing so, and this is what the passage means. Again, Mr. Maitland, when noting the genealogy of Jesus, seems to have forgotten, if he knew, that Mary was of the House of David and a near relative of Joseph. St. Luke in his Gospel does not assert that the Ascension occurred on the day of the Resurrection, and indeed his statements would show that it could not, for it was late in the evening when the Lord revealed Himself to the two disciples by the breaking of bread at Emmaus some sixty stadia from Jerusalem. The journey back must have occupied some hours, and while they were telling the Apostles of what they had seen He again appeared to them all. Luke then goes on to give some account of His instructions to them, and then, in a subsequent paragraph he gives a brief account of the Ascension without saying when it occurred. There is no account that the mother of Jesus tried to dissuade Him from doing His Father's business.

If Mr. Maitland have no better arguments against the history contained in the New Testament than he has brought forward in his letter, he had better confine himself to the speculative philosophy of the question which, consisting as it does of reasonings on possibilities, cannot be confuted, for it is not susceptible of argument.

I should like to add that I most thoroughly endorse the last sentence of Dr. Wyld's letter in No. 238 of "LIGHT." While I freely admit the possibility of spiritual development by the aid, as I believe is often the case, of other spirits, and the working of what may be termed miracles by such aid, I am certain that such development and such powers are extremely limited, and cannot be satisfying. The only true and satisfying teaching is that of the Spirit of God in accordance with the testimony of the Anointed Saviour, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.—I am, yours very sincerely,

Kennington,
July 25th, 1885.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I trust you will allow me a few lines in order to place this question in a light in which it has not hitherto been regarded by any of your correspondents, and which, I fancy, neither Mr. Maitland nor Mrs. Anna Kingsford will find it easy to answer.

It consists of that which is considered good reasoning in geometry, a reductio ad absurdum.

Let us suppose that there was no historic Jesus, in other words that the Jesus of the Four Gospels was not a real but a fictitious character, a creature of pure imagination, and therefore that the Gospels were pure fictions—romances in fact.

What results from this view? Nothing less than this, that these novels or romances have not only delighted the imagination or improved the morals, but that they have changed in the most definite manner the whole current of the world's history. Only just consider what a vast external and historical effect Christianity has had upon the world! To begin with the Apostles and martyrs of the first three centuries. They passed their lives in labours, dangers, and sufferings, were thrown to the wild beasts, or were consumed by fire or the sword, because they committed the blunder of mistaking mere romances for narratives of real events. Paganism expired in the Roman Empire from the same cause. The life of Jesus was deemed historical.

This same blunder created a vast literature—Greek, Roman, and modern—a literature of enormous dimensions, and still continuous, all of which was founded on the same error.

This error, moreover, created all the cathedrals, churches, monasteries, hospitals, schools, universities, colleges, libraries, &c., which fill Europe, America, and much of Asia. All those vast externalities owe their origin to the implicit belief in the reality of the Jesus of the Four Gospels. It is attested by all the records of these foundations, and by the lives and professions and customs of their ministers, scholars, or inmates.

The historic Jesus has been the animating principle of the grandest pictures in the world, and of its grandest music.

Moreover, this belief has revolutionised the morals of society, greatly influenced its law, and even changed the tenure of property.

This belief has given rise to wars, persecutions, and has occupied the thoughts, affected the feelings, changed the interests, and aroused the liveliest hopes and fears of all the generations since in the most enlightened parts of the world.

The whole of these mighty consequences have arisen from mistaking a romance for a history!

I humbly submit that this is, if anything ever was, a reductio ad absurdum.

G. D. HAUGHTON.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—I go so entirely with Mrs. Kingsford and Mr. Maitland in their insistence on the symbolical nature of sacred Scripture, and, at the same time, by the idiosyncrasy of my persuasion, am enabled to subscribe to the concluding paragraph of Dr. Wyld's letter in "LIGHT," of the 14th, with regard to the "intense human personality" of the Lord Jesus Christ, that I am induced to refer such genuine inquirers as are seeking towards a reconciliation of these views, to the writings of the early schoolmen, who were philosophers as well as theologians, Theosophists, and saints; who, having recapitulated the whole of religious doctrine experientially within their own lives, were able to appreciate the superlative and saving nature of that catholic advent of the Son of Man which was manifest to them within the veil—not a Christ, but the Christ, and only Son of God, universal as the creeds symbolically rehearse.

NEMON.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—As Dr. Wyld, Mrs. Kingsford, and Mr. Maitland have been good enough to allude in your columns to my own personal belief about Christ, will you allow me to say a word more on the subject? Though in general agreement with the teaching of the two latter, which seems to me, on the whole, of high value, I am in profound disagreement with them, as Dr. Wyld rightly states, on the question of the historic Christ, though I can hardly think the pages of "LIGHT" a fitting place for a long discussion on the evidences of Christianity. To enter into the historical details touched upon by Mr. Maitland would take up too much time and space. Still, his avowment of the unhistoric character of the Gospel narrative is so vehement and positive that a word seems called for in reply. For my part, I entirely agree with Dr. Wyld that the discrepancies do not affect the substantial veracity of the history in any important particular. To me, on the contrary, they are proof that it is not a concocted forgery. Discrepancies quite as serious are to be found in the narrative of events of which no one seriously doubts the historic veracity. The French and the English give, and have always given, different versions of the Battle of Waterloo, and yet the history of Europe since that event can hardly be accounted for if the battle never took place. Nor to my mind can the modern history of the world, or of the Christian Church, be accounted for without the assumption that the New Testament biography of Jesus is in all essential particulars correct. The discrepancies alleged, moreover, are often the result of mere misunderstanding, as the Rev. G. Allen showed in the conversation at the meeting of the Hermetic Society concerning what Jesus is stated in Matthew and Mark to have told His disciples about meeting them in Galilee after His resurrection.

One of the difficulties triumphantly vaunted by sceptics was that Cyrenius (or Quirinus), according to Josephus, was not Governor of Syria till eight years after the birth of our Lord, though Luke states the contrary. But it has now been established by Zumpt, of Berlin, that he was twice Governor, and the first time from B.C. 4 to B.C. 1. I myself was witness of a battle in the Lebanon between mountain tribes, of which I gave a perfectly honest account; and a friend of mine, present at the same battle, gave a different version with equal honesty. Argal, that battle never took place! Nay, but had we been concocting a story there would have been no discrepancy.

Not the most sceptical of critics now disputes the genuineness of four epistles of St. Paul. Now these must have been written, at the latest, 28 years after the crucifixion of Jesus. And from the allusions in them to most of the important events recorded in the Gospels as to notorious and generally-received facts, we may conclude that these narratives are fairly accurate in their relations. Moreover, it is evident from these epistles that very much the same doctrinal beliefs concerning Christ obtained among His disciples at that early time as have obtained among them since. Yet surely had these narratives been spiritual parables, or myths only, they could hardly have got themselves generally received as sober fact within so short a time after the alleged events, while a multitude of contemporaries were still living to correct the mistake. And the difficulty that these wonderful spiritual parables—which have so imposed on mankind, and changed the course of history—must have been invented for the most part by more or less illiterate Galileans, Mr. Maitland meets by ascribing them rather to learned Alexandrian Jews. But how reconcile this view with the admitted authenticity of some of St. Paul's Epistles? We know from Pliny, Tacitus, and other heathen writers, that about A.D. 60 Jesus Christ was already adored and revered by His followers as Divine.

Then the Epistle of Clement of Rome, the companion of Paul, found written on the Alexandrian MSS. of the New Testament, presented by the Byzantine patriarch to Charles I., and now, I believe, admitted by all scholars to be genuine, testifies that the same alleged facts as we have related in the Gospels were believed in that early period of the Church's history—a like testimony being borne by the Epistle of Polycarp, the personal friend of St. John, and that of Irenæus, the friend of Polycarp; while to me it certainly appears that the Divine Humanity of Jesus Christ is as clearly taught by the Synoptic Gospels as by that of John, though not so much insisted on, and philosophically expounded.

Why did not Celsus, the great heathen opponent of Christianity, who wrote early in the second century, deny the authenticity of the Gospel narrative, if it was open to him so to do? whereas he cites nearly all the facts related in our four Gospels about Jesus and a great number of His sayings, as authentic, urging that these facts and words are derived from memoirs written by the disciples of Jesus. Why did not the Gnostic Marcion, or St. Valentinus, born about the end of the first century, while St. John was still alive, dispute their authenticity? But in Justin Martyr again, who was born in the year that John died, we have all the same facts (miraculous and others) cited, and the same doctrine concerning Christ deduced from them. He says, moreover, that these facts are derived from the memoirs called Gospels, written by the Apostles, and their companions. He informs us also that these Gospels had been read systematically in the churches from the beginning. Indeed, there is no trace anywhere of any question at all being raised concerning the authenticity of our New Testament narratives in the earliest ages of the Church—nay, concerning the authenticity of those twenty books called Homologumena, which constitute what is termed the First Canon. Irenæus says he had known Polycarp, who was familiar with many persons who "had seen the Lord," and heard the venerable man repeat "all they had told him about His miracles and doctrine." Indeed, "the testimony to our Canon," as Michaelis observes, "is infinitely superior to anything that ancient literature could present to us in favour even of the most abundantly-attested books." A long superintendence of the churches they founded by the Apostles themselves—the jealous care with which the sacred books were preserved, special guardians and readers of them being appointed—seems alone sufficient to account for the unanimity of the agreement concerning them, attested by Celsus, Justin, and other writers of the early part of the second century, as existing in all Christian communities scattered throughout the world.

And to my mind the history of the rise and progress of the Christian Church proves and involves the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ in all essential particulars such as we have them recorded, even as the recent history of Europe proves the actual occurrence of the French Revolution. For I suppose Mrs. Kingsford can hardly be serious when she assures us that virtually there is no such thing as history! And yet there are grave divergencies in the accounts that have come down to us of the Great Revolution. But do apparent differences in the reports about the day on which Jesus was crucified throw serious doubt upon the fact itself? Surely not. Clarendon relates that the Marquis of Argyll, in Charles II.'s reign, was condemned to be hanged, and actually hanged the same day. But Burnet states that he was condemned to be beheaded on Saturday, and executed on Monday. Shall we therefore conclude that he was not executed at all? The Embassy of the Jews to Claudius is placed by two contemporary historians, Philo, and Josephus, at a different time of the year—did it, therefore, not take place at all?

With respect to my argument from the moral influence of a living example being superior to that of a merely conceived ideal, either Mr. Maitland has misapprehended me, or I have failed to understand his answer. He says that for a sculptor to realise an ideal of beauty in a statue it is not necessary for him to have a perfect model of beauty before him. Now, first, I think that statement open to question. It is plausibly contended that if a sculptor seeks various features of beauty in different models, he runs the risk of putting together an incongruous whole. At any rate, he will certainly seek for a model as perfectly beautiful in every respect as he can find. And among the Greeks I do not doubt that many individuals, beautiful in almost every respect, were to be found. His aesthetic sense, his genius for beauty should also go far to help him in creation.

But Mr. Maitland is certainly wrong when he says that for this new revelation of beauty there was no need of "more beauty than usual in the world"; that uncommon beauty very surely existed. I think, moreover, that the genius for moral beauty, in proportion as it deals with a higher type of excellence, is also a much rarer type of genius. And here it is assumed that there were many such engaged in the imagination of Jesus Christ. Remember it is not a popular ideal of goodness; rather one utterly opposed to the expectation, and aspiration of those who at that time were looking for a Messiah. It is, moreover, not the ideal of the Alexandrian Philo (see "Philochristus"), nor precisely that of the Stoics, Epicureans, or Essenes. I believe that had the mythopoeists put together the character of Christ from diverse models of excellence, there could never have resulted the living congruous Individuality, which has for so long influenced and, in part at least, transformed society.

But who, then, are these imaginative artists, far greater, because more spiritual than Shakespeare, whose names have been so long and unaccountably withheld from all knowledge? But this touches the possibility of conceiving, and creating in imagination the character of Jesus. It does not in the least touch my argument from the superior transforming, and stimulating force of a concrete living example over that of an ideal merely conceived in the mind. It is surely unquestionable that a noble example—be it Gordon, or the Curé D'Ars, or humbler people than they (say an Alice Ayres, or a Grace Darling)—fires men to emulation, and strengthens them for virtue far more than discourses, however eloquent, and more than mere solitary aspirations. But it is not equally obvious that the contemplation of physical beauty has a tendency to produce physical beauty in ourselves. Yet that should be so, to warrant Mr. Maitland's negative argument from analogy. If a fairly realised moral ideal gives great encouragement to those who are striving after perfection, a supremely realised ideal gives yet more. The ideal having already passed from the region of vague aspiration and imagination to that of actuality and life, we feel that this may happen again, whereas such a possibility is still problematic if it has not done so.

What Mrs. Kingsford, however, so beautifully says of the Eucharistic and universal value of the saints' merit, and of their present quickening influence over men, in virtue of their own attainment, is in exact agreement with what I urged in my own paper concerning Jesus. Prayer, therefore, may be made to saints, but more especially to the Lord. I only claim Him as the Head and Leader and Representative of the race—as the God-Man—because He, more fully than any other, so clearly known to us through history, has atoned His human with that Divine consciousness, which is the true and eternal individuality of all.

I do not think we Christians are idolatrous, as is alleged. It is not idolatry to adore the adorable. For God the Father is hidden until manifested in the Son. And while I am not blind to the Divine Word, as spoken in nature, and the rich fulness of all humanity—nay, while admitting that the revelation in Jesus needs to be supplemented by these—yet I do feel that Nature, with her tyrant law of survival, is obscure, and that ordinary men and women are often darkness visible. But in the wise, supremely-loving, just, and self-sacrificing member of our race, in proportion as virtue belongs to him or her, is God most fully revealed, light being radiated from the humblest loving and righteous human heart upon the profoundest mysteries and darkest places of "all this unintelligible world."

Madame de Steiger says that history cannot be true because it appeals to the senses. But this objection applies equally to all science. History and science alike appeal through sense to very much higher faculties, without which they cannot be understood. If you believe in evolution, how disbelieve history? History reveals the action and reaction of individuals on one another, and personality is the goal of evolution. Though the elements of free-will, and testimony add some uncertainty to the study, yet, for all that, "the proper study of mankind is man." Eternal principles reveal themselves behind the apparent caprice of persons; and it is attempting to jump off our own shadow to fancy that principles may manifest themselves otherwise than to the calm and piercing vision that looks through the ever shifting phantasmagoria of sense to those eternal verities of which these are "broken lights." We learn more upon the terra firma of experience than bobbinating in vacuo upon the chimera of metaphysic. That method has been tried in past ages with little promise of success. Whereas some seem to fancy that eternal truth is independent of, and apart from, all that appears in time, eternal truth is, indeed, but the perfect intuition of the very same things, which we behold imperfectly under our own native condition of time.

Can anyone deny the law of heredity or that of cause and effect? Yet its influence for good or evil is only through biography, or history. Events in time affect us, because we are in time. And they incur a grave responsibility who seek to deprive our poor work of its chief Consoler.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

RODEN NOEL.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXVIII.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Monsignor Capel, of all priests and prelates, has been lecturing on Spiritualism, and, of all places in the world, at Salt Lake City. He attacked it on two grounds—as being opposed to Catholic doctrine, and as having a bad physical influence.

He took it for granted that his audience were Christian. If they had been Agnostics he would have taken other grounds. Every Christian believes in direct communications from God. Every man, woman, and child possesses such communication by conscience—a universal communication which tells us what is right and what is wrong, and the half-civilised African possesses it as well as the cultured gentleman of Europe.

Besides this, the Church was constituted to reveal the will of God to man. It teaches that there are personal angels and devils. When a man died, if he had lived a good life, he was immediately taken into the presence and friendship of God. If he had committed sins, he would atone for them in purgatory; but if he died in blasphemy, woe unto him. There was no salvation beyond the grave for such. Of course there was no room for Spiritualism in such a system.

Monsignor Capel said he had been clever enough to unmask two mediums. In one case a sound of thunder ceased when the feet of the medium were placed on a cushion; in another, when a slate-writing medium went to Paris the spirits could not write French.

This is too silly, even for Monsignor Capel. Every Spiritualist knows that with Eglinton or Slade messages are written in Latin, Greek, French, German, Italian. Mr. Gladstone wrote questions on a locked slate in four languages unknown to the medium, and, while the slate was locked, he got answers to each question in the language in which it was written.

Monsignor Capel, however, had the grace to acknowledge that there are manifestations not easy to explain. But then he said: "Many of the laws of nature were yet imperfectly understood; mesmerism, so-called magnetism, mind-reading, and other seemingly supernatural phenomena belong to the science of biology, and would yet be explained by the laws of science. What would have been thought three hundred years ago of a man who should have declared the possibilities of the telegraph and telephone? He would have been called a madman. Scientists and medical men were watching and investigating biology closely, and the explanation would come."

"But, supposing that all that is claimed for Spiritualism is true," said this remarkable Monsignor, "what good is it? What happiness is there in the knowledge of a few raps, a little slate-writing, and an intimation that 'so-and-so is happy in the spirit land?' It wrecked the physical organisation. He could almost tell a Spiritualist from his knowledge of physiognomy. By the wandering eye, the gloomy disposition, &c., he could point them out. He had good authority for stating that the end of many Spiritualists was in the lunatic asylum."

This is very bad, or would be if it were not false and silly. Religious mania is common enough. A belief in the orthodox hell and the doctrines of Calvin has sent many to lunatic asylums. The effect of Spiritualism is quite the reverse.

Finally, Monsignor Capel said that Spiritualism was not only dangerous, but wicked. He declared that "belief in divination is blasphemy, and he cautioned his hearers against indulging in it. It was as if a man should ask to patent a small tub to cross the Atlantic when there are already magnificent ocean steamers which make the voyage in safety. Spiritualism attempted to dethrone God; the laws with regard to communication with the invisible were fixed, and it is blasphemy for any 'ism to pry further into the secrets of the Almighty. Spiritualism has had its existence since the Witch of Endor called up the spirit of Samuel, and evidently the witch made a much better job of it than do the mediums now-a-days."

A clever man, this Monsignor, but it might be better even for ever so clever a man to take the trouble to know what he is talking about, or to stick to what cannot be known, and therefore cannot be contradicted—theology, for example. The idea of going to Salt Lake City to give such a lecture! Well! the opponents of Spiritualism now learn that the first condition of giving a good lecture on any subject is to know something about it.

Reading this probably imperfect report of Monsignor Capel's lecture, copied in the London Catholic organ, the Universe, I cannot but wonder how this man ever became Monsignor; and I do not wonder that he was silenced in England, and obliged to find some other field for his labours. The lecture is false—but it is worse than that. It is unprincipled.

For example—can any Spiritualist believe in the bona fides of a man who could preface what I have quoted above with this declaration?—"He would give many Spiritualists the credit of being honest, but the dress in the crucible was large and heavy. It was also true that many bright and intelligent minds had belief in it. He would not speak from prejudice, but from an impartial investigation of many years. Curiosity was a good thing in itself, but he deprecated it in a matter of religion; he had investigated it from a scientific standpoint."

The declaration of the late Cromwell Varley, a thoroughly scientific man, and a model investigator, was that no man of science ever investigated Spiritualism without being convinced of its reality—that is, without becoming a Spiritualist—which is true even of those who began with the intention of exposing what they supposed to be a delusion.

Monsignor Capel is no more shallow than are most of the religious opponents of Spiritualism. We can understand its being denounced as fraud and imposture by those who have not examined it. The world is full of men who judge without examination; but to denounce a thing as fraud, and condemn it at the same time as diabolical is supremely silly. The best thing is to know what is; and a man who stands on a platform, or gets into a pulpit, should take some pains to know what he is talking about.

Our Calcutta friend, Mr. J. G. Meugens, now happily revelling in the American Spiritualist camp-meetings, has written a close column in the Banner of Light, headed—"How I became a Spiritualist." It was a simple, sensible method, open to every intelligent person. He read the published works of scientific investigators like Crookes, Zollner, and Wallace. On a visit to England he made personal investigations, and then invited Mr. Eglinton, the medium, to Calcutta. Few men have done more for Spiritualism than Mr. Meugens.

It seems pretty clear that the Seybert Commission of the University of Pennsylvania is making a mess of its investigations of Spiritualism. Mr. Henry Seybert left by will sixty thousand dollars (£12,000) for the investigation of Spiritualism. It is a well-known condition of the higher class of manifestations that there shall be at least fair play—not belief, but something like passivity. One strong will may prevent all manifestation. It is said that the amount of wilful opposition in the commission is very trying to the mediums, and mars, if it does not entirely prevent, the action of the spirits. If it were a question of chemistry, mental opposition would not matter—but then it would not exist. An investigator of Spiritualism should be as accurate, but also as unprejudiced, as a chemist or physiologist.

For example, when some of the members of the commission were present two slates were bought joined with hinges and fastened together with a screw, with a bit of pencil between them. In a few minutes the pencil was found on the upper slate and a sentence written inside. At a séance which another member attended they sat two hours without a scratch. The moment they were gone it was written on the slate—"We could not overcome the influences." It is easier to pass solid through solid, than to get through a mental prejudice.

An American newspaper, the Saratoga Eagle, announces the accession of Rev. John P. Newman—the former pastor of General Grant, and one of the greatest pulpit orators in the Methodist church—to the ranks of Spiritualism. The conversion is not a sudden one, however, as Dr. Newman has been for years an intelligent investigator into the phenomena and a student of the philosophy of Modern Spiritualism, and it is said that his wife is not only a strong believer but is herself a medium. Dr. Newman is a regular Saratoga summer guest, and a great favourite there, and he will, without doubt, be warmly welcomed before the Saratoga Society of Spiritualists.

A very few clergymen in England have investigated Spiritualism, and most of these have visited mediums by night, and spoken only to intimate friends of their observations. Mr. Haweis, Mr. Page Hopps, and a few others have had courage to give their testimony to the truth. Many more have quietly profited by it. It is a nice question—that of our duty to tell the truth. It depends upon the good it may do, or the harm of withholding it. That knowledge which we value ourselves we naturally wish to give to all around us.

The late George Dawson, a Radical lecturer, who in the last years of his life became a settled preacher in Birmingham, is said to be the spirit control of Mrs. Groom, who lately spoke at the Cavendish Rooms. His most intimate friends in Birmingham are satisfied of his identity, and some of the matter given here was certainly worthy and characteristic. He said:—"I offer you no creed but one: Be a believer in God, His angels, and the spirit-world, ever working out the highest dictates of Divine wisdom. . . . With all my earthly knowledge, I found myself just like a babe on the shores of spiritual existence, waiting, still waiting, to see the realisation of my hopes. I have found my wife, I have found my child. This is indeed Heaven. . . . Before I passed out of the body I was a minister of the Church of the Saviour, Birmingham. I was branded, when first I went to Birmingham, for being too free in religious speech, and for not teaching their canonical creeds. And now that I have passed to the Better Land, I thank God that my people, as they pass out of the body, join my Church in the Heavenly Spheres." We are apt to expect too much of our spirit friends. There is progress, step by step—not sudden transformations. There, as here, we live and learn—but with Eternity before us we have no need to hurry.

EDITORIAL NOTICE.—In consequence of the extreme pressure on our space caused by the correspondence on "The Historic Jesus," we have been obliged to hold over several articles of more general interest. Next week, however, our columns will be clear, and we hope to give some of the outstanding communications. Amongst these we may mention "The Unconscious Secondary Self," a criticism of the methods and theories of the Society for Psychical Research, by Henry Kiddle; "Statuolism," No. II., by W. M. Fahnestock, M.D., &c., &c. We have also much pleasure in informing our readers that we have in view a series of articles on Mesmerism, Psychometry, Palmistry, Statuolism, and other phases of Occult Research. These papers will treat each of these subjects in a practical and experimental manner, giving plain instructions to investigators.

I propose to offer some impressions of "Sympneumata" differing widely from that conveyed by the long and powerfully written review which appeared in successive numbers of "LIGHT" some months ago. To follow seriatim the charges preferred against the book by the reviewer would be foreign to my purpose, which is not directly controversial. But in defining what I believe to be essential in the conceptions presented to us reference will of course be made to objections which will appear as misapprehensions if the view I oppose to them is correct. One of them, however, meets us on the threshold, and is so obstructive to any clear conception of psychical evolution that we must endeavour to come to an understanding with it at once.

It is remarkable that two books of nearly contemporary publication—Du Prel's "Philosophie der Mystik," and "Sympneumata"—contain an almost identical protest against the fallacy of transferring to nature the dualism which in thought abstracts force from matter, or spirit from body. Materialism, as the German author shows, is chiefly due to a confusion of the super-sensible with the supernatural; that is, to an inability to see that nature is not limited to our existing sensibility, but will become progressively more sensible with the evolution of organic conditions more susceptible to its impact. The Spiritualist, on the other hand, it is said, makes the same mistake, but believing more in the force or spirit side of the dualistic conception, hypostasises spirit as a mode of existence independent of organic conditions of consciousness. Now it is evident that all sensibility, whether it be that of an external sense for an external object, or of an internal sense for an intelligent or even Divine influence—spiritual intuition—implies a receptivity and reaction; that is to say, a mode of existence which must be conceived both objectively as sensible, and subjectively as sensitive. As Du Prel has pointed out, it is only the psychophysical "threshold" of sensibility which prevents any influence—such as "thought-transference"—from passing into sensible apprehension. And so our own thoughts, in the degree that they were forcible and distinct, would be phenomenally perceptible by another "spirit" which should objectively apprehend them. And, indeed, if all correspondence from a higher plane to a lower, or from the relatively subjective to the objective, are just such representations, then is our whole "material" Nature nothing else (as Hinton taught).

It is common now to hear the phrase "refined materialism," applied by way of reproach to every attempt to make the conditions of a higher existence scientifically conceivable. There is, indeed, one way of doing this which must always evoke a philosophical protest. That is when "matter" is accepted as an absolute entity or substance antecedent to consciousness, and is merely attenuated for the support of a consciousness which somehow, and for that sole reason, is supposed to be more spiritual. The dualism in our conception is not resolved by adopting one side of it, the other side immediately breaking out in the antithesis which marks the earlier stages of idealism. Both these views, however, are at least professedly monistic; whereas, to speak with your reviewer of the spiritual as "the real antithesis of the material" is to concede an independent existence to matter, maintaining the dualism which will always justify the presence of a materialistic no less than of a spiritualistic school of thought. The aim of philosophy is surely not to show where matter ends and spirit begins as independent phases of existence, but to carry our conception to a deeper level at which the apparent difference is suppressed. Such a solution will not divide the universe into material and spiritual substances, the former on the lower planes of life, the latter on the higher, but will exhibit this dualism as one of aspects merely, re-appearing as such on every plane of individuality. For any mode of existence which can be brought within positive experience—however subjective and therefore "spiritual"—it now relatively is or seems—must then take on the objective aspect, which will be found continuous with the same aspect in the lower, or earlier objectified, modes. If existences, as for instance the other modes of consciousness which we call other individuals, are externally perceptible at all in the "spiritual" world, that must be, as here, through an objective aspect, that is, phenomenally. And that which for external observation will be an appearance, a body, will for the subject be its organism, its means of expression and operation. But with increased power and intensity of the conscious life its expression or phenomenon must correspond by mobility, flexibility, and adaptability to the inner impulse; in a word, by "fluidity." Our bodies here are more solid, not because they are more "material," but because they express a lethargic consciousness, an undeveloped life, and a defective will. The force, which objectively expressed is mobility, or that condition of matter in which it readily yields to, and represents the force by, form, is still comparatively latent.

When, therefore, the reviewer censures "Sympneumata" for ascribing "spiritual impurity to solid matters on the ground of its physical density, and spiritual purity to tenuous matter on the ground of its physical rarity," he overlooks the initial thesis of the book, that "matter" is to be identified with "the whole universal medium for the transmission of force" (p. 11), a definition which, while preserving the continuity of nature throughout all the planes of manifestation, deprives matter of any distinctive character of its own, or apart from the quality of the force which it expresses and transmits. If the book lays stress, as no doubt it does, on the material aspect, that is because this aspect, as a constant phenomenon, is the object of scientific apprehension. The organism is just the mode of receptivity to, and reaction upon, impressions whether from without or from within; in other words it is the particular differentiation of consciousness. Absolutely or metaphysically conceived, it is neither material nor immaterial substance, but assumes one or other aspect as it is regarded from the objective or from the subjective point of view. That is merely to say again, that the dualism of force and matter, or spirit and body, belongs, not to the truth of things, but to our conception of them. It is therefore not materialism to recognise in every mode and degree of sensibility an organic condition, and to speak of that condition in terms appropriate to the objective aspect of it—as subtle or fluid materiality—if only that side of the dualistic fallacy is avoided which derives force from its medium, or spirit from its vehicle.

The purpose of "Sympneumata" being to expound the phenomenon of a new sensibility, and at the same time to vindicate for this sensibility a spirituality which should not imply a false antithesis, it was necessary at the outset of the work to reassert the monistic conception of force and matter, mind and body, without which no theory of evolution is at all intelligible. The following passage will have especial interest for those who are opposing scientific prejudice against the recognition of psychical phenomena:—

"It is in this that the misfortune lies, for the minds of the more rationalistic quality, of the great untruth that matter and force are separable. If the scientific man could once realise that in dealing with the moral forces which ultimate themselves dynamically in the actions of men, he was not transgressing the limits of legitimate scientific investigation, and that such investigation could be pursued upon a basis in the strictest sense material, the great barrier would be removed which has heretofore closed the most important of all branches of scientific study, and he would perceive in the experiments which have been made in the science of molecular physics, whereby smaller molecules have been revealed by the use of modern appliances than could previously have been apprehended, evidences that material atoms may continue to elude observation to an indefinite degree, and that the focus of the human eye is not to be relied upon as furnishing a limit beyond which, he may dare to say, no form or matter exists. However, as has been said, his dislike to the pursuit of further investigation into the more hidden secrets of nature, has been due quite as much, if not more, to the assumption of those people who claim an acquaintance with experiences which transcend nature,—which are, they say, supernatural, immaterial, or purely spiritual,—as to any positive disinclination on his part to see no further than the microscope can reveal, or to have no sense of what he cannot touch and weigh." The dualism in question "has not merely had the effect of driving scientific men into a narrow groove of so-called positive investigation, but it has exercised a most pernicious influence upon the opposite class of minds, whom it has confined to the no less narrow groove of spiritual dogmatism, thus separating the students of external nature, and of internal truth, into two violent antagonistic categories. And it will now probably prove to be more repellant to the class which has dealt exclusively with what it has termed the spiritual side of man, to acknowledge the all pervading presence throughout it of matter, than for the scientific class to acknowledge the existence of the moral element in every manifestation of force."

Poor Spiritualists! Only the other day there was Mr. Roden Noel chiding them for their too great readiness to adopt a materialistic conception of spirit as a subtler material form or body; and eminent Rationalists have repeatedly denounced phenomenal Spiritualism for a similar degradation of "spiritual" ideas, applying to it such phrases as "a peculiarly gross form of materialism," and so on. But the above apology for scientific men at their expense may well try their patience more than these aspersions. As if it were their business, rather than that of the scientific people who profess "exact" conceptions of nature, to discover the fallacy of the time-honoured dualism in those conceptions, and as if they are responsible for the grossness of the scientific mind, recognising no phenomena of force which cannot be associated with the matter of the senses!

But with this passing protest against a singularly misapplied censure, the substantial truth and importance of the passages quoted may be admitted. That the false separation of force and matter, spirit and body, in nature is responsible for the division, hitherto irreconcilable, of human thought into materialistic and spiritualistic schools, is a proposition which only requires adequate statement to induce assent. And its clear recognition almost entirely removes objection to terminology which would otherwise be appropriate to a one-sided point of view.

There are in "Sympneumata" three distinctive principles which may be considered, first separately, and then in their combination. One is, that sense-consciousness in organic evolution may be raised to a moral quality, taking the place now occupied in most of us by the ideal or metaphysical consciousness, all moral evolution in the race or the individual testifying to a corresponding biological process which is consummated with the establishment of a new organic basis of the moral life. Henceforward the subject of this completed process—at any stage, that is, of its completion—is not under a "law" of a higher or ideal consciousness, imposing a painful and doubtful struggle with the lower sensational and selfish instincts, but that consciousness has ousted the lower from its sensational vantage ground, and now itself rests on this as the spontaneous nature and delight of life.

Now when the reviewer tells us that "the 'new creature' of mystical science is not a fluidic but a spiritual being, and represents the 'great work' of the Hermetists, the redemption of spirit from matter altogether, whether solid or fluidic, and not the reconstitution of the individual of any particular kind of matter," it is very evident that he there conceives matter as determining consciousness, and not as determined by consciousness. Now that is certainly true of all organic conditions of consciousness, which, as such, mediate the will force, thus belonging to the definition already referred to of "matter." But he forgets, it seems to me, that there are or may be many regenerations or "redemptions"; that the Divine power, which on any organic basis is consciousness, passes downwards, or from within, from one such basis or stage to another, modifying, and at length transmuting the lower one to the next higher. And thus it is,* that whereas consciousness on any organic basis is determined thereby, it, that condition of "matter," is at the same time resolvable, and thus redeterminable, by another force-matter combination, which on the higher stage is again consciousness. If we resolutely and consistently refuse to recognise matter as anything else than the objective aspect of a certain relatively stable condition of consciousness—which stability is expressed by the term organic—we see that the "matter" from which we would be "redeemed" is that fixity of consciousness at any given stage which is then the nature of the individual. If, as the reviewer says, the "great work" is "the redemption of spirit from matter altogether," that is an utter passing out of manifestation, Nirvana, the only condition in which the term "supernatural" has more than a relative sense. That, no doubt, is the undefined ideal of Buddhism, undefined for the very reason that it is a supernatural condition in the absolute sense, the conceptions of reason being always scientific and concerned with nature, whether in its subjective or objective aspect. The evolution of the soul belongs to the natural series, and to oppose a supernatural ideal to any account of that evolution is clearly irrelevant, however right it may be philosophically, to point to a consummation which signifies no more than that the natural process is completed. But the great teachers of old usually meant by "matter" the lower quality of sensation corresponding to the grosser organism expressive of the lower life. The pure soul had still its "vehicle," its soma angoides: Neo-Platonic speculation distinguishing between bodies terrestrial and ethereal, and assigning the more tenuous bodies to the purer souls.

* I wish here, once for all, to apologise for any apparent dogmatism of language. So far as any conception becomes clear to us, it resembles a perception of truth, and we almost unavoidably use expressions appropriate to that intuition.

To understand the first of the three leading ideas in "Sympneumata" on which we are now engaged, it must be remembered that all moral and spiritual emotion is therein conceived as the sensation of a higher organic degree, inchoate for our lower degree, but tending to become the ultimate basis of the whole conscious life. Not till we have examined the second idea, which tells us what this new life of the individual, to be thus ultimated, really is, can we see that the moral quality of the sensation is completely guaranteed. But this we can see at once: that sensation, and the organic "matter" which both mediates it and is its objective aspect, are correlates than which no two sides more inseparable can be imagined. Now, if further we recognise in the growth of the moral consciousness a sensational element, the intensity of which is the measure of that consciousness, we must admit that a new moral nature will be a sensational basis and impulse of the will, making moral action instructive, certain, and delightful, instead of difficult, precarious, and painful. The distinctive external aspect of this organic nature, as fluidic rather than solid, is the material expression of the expansive or spiritual quality, which has now prevailed over the contractive quality represented by the solid form. The reviewer is known to be an eminent student of mystical—which are really philosophical—conceptions, and this correspondence is certainly not strange to him.

Our consciousness is sensational, emotional, and ideal. The middle term partakes of the first and third; like physical sensation, it is feeling, and it is associated with ideas. The power of ideas over us is measurable by the degree in which they can produce certain mental affections, determining the direction of our intellectual and practical energies. Now as the emotion is a spontaneous reaction upon the idea, it testifies to a certain organic basis existing in the individual as special character and tendency. The idea to which one consciousness leaps upwards in emotional response impresses another's consciousness not at all, or rather it wants that fulness of intellectual apprehension in which assent by the will is involved. The function of will in intellectual processes is insufficiently recognised in psychology, though it has often been insisted upon by a profound religious discernment, and is at the foundation of the mystery of "faith," so little comprehended by the merely rationalistic understanding. It is an affinity with the idea, implying that the order of consciousness to which the idea belongs has become organically seated in the psychical constitution. The idealist will certainly be repelled by the prominence conceded to "sensation" in "Sympneumata," unless this indissoluble association of the ideal with the emotional consciousness is understood. There is no greater fallacy than that we cannot will what to believe, since in truth we believe nothing which we do not will.† But this "will" is not conscious volition; it is pre-disposition. As such it is a mode of sensibility, an intuitive faculty, as truly a sense for truth as seeing is a sense for its objects.‡

Now it is with the evolution of this faculty, in substitution of the present physical basis of consciousness as the "ultimate" of man, that "Sympneumata" is concerned. Never mind, for the moment whether the book has rightly defined what will come forth in this consciousness; we have first to see that it has rightly described the basis of the new consciousness as sensational. For this, the "alluring tones and lavish promises of sensational compensations," the "ascription of physical attributes to spiritual principles," is one of a long list of charges against it, for which the closest examination I have been able to give the text discovers no real, and sometimes not even an apparent warrant.§

§ "For many, as they say in the mysteries, are the thyrsus-bearers, but few are the mystics," meaning, as I interpret the words, the true philosophers."—Phaedo, Jowett's Translation.

† "The will," says Swedenborg, "leads the understanding, and causes it to act in unity with itself; and the love which is of the will calls that wisdom in the understanding which agrees with itself."—Divine Love and Wisdom, s. 245.

‡ "The thought is nothing but internal sight."—Swedenborg, Op. cit., s. 404.
§ The last specified, for instance, "the insidious intimation of man's exemption . . . from any call for self-sacrifice," p. 30, is referred to. Unless this is a misprint, or a wrong reference, there is here a charge not even remotely relevant to the particular matter adduced in justification of it.

The superiority which we justly ascribe to intellect over sense belongs not to the faculty but to its objects. On the contrary, all direct and immediate perception is in its own nature a superior mode of knowledge to that which we now represent ideally. And perfect intellection would be that in which the moments of the process were suppressed, the result being intuitively present. This is just what happens in developed sense perception, in which all psychologists, whether they belong to the Association school or are followers of Kant, recognise either mental processes or mental laws. It may even be questioned whether there are really two generically distinct faculties of knowledge or apprehension. Thought, not being yet perfectly organised in us for the possession of objects other than those of our sense, repeats the moments of its process laboriously, and therefore consciously. In sense the object is gained with apparent immediacy, the moments being indiscernible by reason of organic facility. We have no criterion of reality except immediate apprehension. The disparagement of sense may therefore have no other justification than that we have as yet only developed a sense for inferior objects. And if this is true of sense-perception it must likewise be true of the emotional element of sense, sensation. "Lavish promises of sensational compensation" would thus be the promise of organic spontaneity for the highest emotions of the soul. The question whether this is so in "Sympneumata," introduces us to the second of the ideas which I have distinguished for convenience of examination. That will exhibit the evolution of human solidarity in the individual consciousness, parallel to its social manifestations. The third idea, which essentially characterises the book, combines the conception of the organic basis of the new life with that of its humanitarian and non-egoistic quality, in the announcement that this development of consciousness is a further ultimation of the Divine love and sex principle, derived from God to man, and thus only can be realised and expressed.

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

CROYDON.—Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond delivered an inspirational address in the Public Hall, Croydon, on the 21st inst. Considering that only about three days' notice could be given to the public, the attendance was very good, there being about 150 persons present. We believe that this is by far the most aggressive move Spiritualism has hitherto made at Croydon, and its success will be a great encouragement to further efforts in the same direction. The subject of the address was "Spiritualism as a Portion of Daily Life," and it was treated in a most practical, vigorous, and dignified manner. The calm and graceful bearing of Mrs. Richmond at once disarmed all unfriendly feeling, and enlisted the sympathy of the audience, who listened with the greatest attention. An interval at the commencement was devoted to answering questions; and the manner in which some most difficult questions were grappled with seemed to strike the uninitiated with wonder. But wonder rose to astonishment when, upon the audience choosing a subject, an impromptu poem of much merit and beauty was immediately delivered upon it. A great impression was undoubtedly made, and many expressed themselves as highly gratified. It was felt that "sweetness and light" of so much attractiveness could come from no uncanny source; and that no reason nor motive could be assigned why power and culture of such unmistakable elevation should stoop to senseless simulations, and assume utterly unprofitable and useless disguises. The feeling, therefore, was widely spread that, after all, "there may be something in this Spiritualism," and many have expressed the desire to see more of it. Mr. J. H. Mitchiner, F.R.A.S., presided, to whose wise and energetic care in the arrangements a share of the success is due. Great interest has been excited in the subject. It is contemplated repeating the experiment when Mrs. Richmond returns in the autumn.—Communicated.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- H. A. KERSEY.—Next week. Our columns are too crowded to permit its insertion now.
A. J. C.—We have forwarded your communication to Mr. Maitland as you requested.
S. E. GAY.—Letter to hand. Shall be glad to help the friend you name, and have written him to that effect. Will also attend to the other matter in due course.
C. J. A.—We were glad to hear from you. You must, however, kindly excuse a personal reply, though we should much like to write you occasionally.
REV. J. D. HULL.—Your letter and papers came duly to hand. We used one last week. Could you not occasionally send us an article on the same or similar lines? We should welcome you as a regular contributor.
E. H.—Why do you hide your attack on the "Dr." behind a non-de-plume? We never notice anonymous communications, and we moreover think you can do many better things than talk scandal. If you have a complaint go and have it out with the person concerned, but not like a coward, stab him behind his back.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE:

CHAMBERS: 16, CRAVEN STREET, CHANCERY CROSS, S.W.

This Society of Spiritualists, founded for the purpose, primarily, of uniting those who share a common faith, and then of giving information respecting that faith to those who seek for it, has now occupied Chambers at the above address. There will be found an extensive Library of works especially attractive to Spiritualists; the various Journals of Spiritualism published in this and other countries; and opportunities of converse with friends like-minded. The Alliance holds periodical Soirées at the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, where papers on interesting phases of the subject are read, and discussion is invited.

Particulars as to Membership (minimum Annual Subscription, One Guinea) may be obtained from the Hon. Sec.,

MORELL THEOBALD,

62, Granville Park, Blackheath, S.E.

The following list, which will be continued by the courtesy of the editor until complete, will show what an important library is now available for use by members of the London Spiritualist Alliance. It is the desire of the Council that the books should be used by Spiritualists, and should not merely be available for consultation in our Chambers. To this end they have made arrangements for their being removed, under certain restrictions, for home reading. The publication of a catalogue in "LIGHT" will place at the disposal of every member a list which will enable him to select at his leisure what he may wish to read. Rules and regulations will be at once drawn up, so that the Library may be available without unnecessary delay.

W. STANTON MOSES, M.A., President.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S.; President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Perty, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Frische, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edwards, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. Fichte, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russell Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this. What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to those the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source.—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CHORWELL F. VAILLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of anylegerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis d'Esdes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglington, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglington, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglington, and regarding which he said:

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny.

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you, &c., &c."

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerov, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

STATUOLENCE.—II.

By W. B. FAHNESTOCK, M.D.

As this art cannot be demonstrated upon paper, a description will give but an imperfect idea of the powers of the Statuolence, or the possibilities of which he is capable. Statuolence, being the foundation of spirit control, cannot be separated from it, and as the aura or scent of individuals is the medium of communication it should be perfectly understood. As far as my investigations have gone, I find it simply to be the effete materiality eliminated from the body, and, being peculiar in each individual, is more or less electric (and not "animal magnetic," as generally supposed); consequently, being material, it can be seen by clairvoyants emanating from the bodies of individuals as they are more or less excited. Indeed, a Mr. William Underwood, of Paw Paw, Michigan, is so electric that he can charge a Leyden jar, and by breathing upon, and briskly rubbing, a handkerchief can set fire to and consume it. I state this fact upon the authority of Judge Hilton and other intelligent persons of Paw Paw, Michigan, but like all other cases, the abundance of electricity, in his case, is, outside of faith, destitute of healing qualities. I have stated that the aura eliminated from individuals is the means of spirit communion, and there is no doubt that it enables spirits to approach persons, especially those who are sensitive, and by adding or combining their spirit aura or materiality with that of the medium they can effect a temporary appearance or materialisation. This body being then simply electrically and spiritually material, upon being "grabbed," its constituents separate—and, none of these being individually solid, the body cannot be held any more than substances which are gaseous.

It has been argued that because some persons feel a shock upon approaching paper said to be "magnetised," it is a proof that it contains animal "magnetism," and consequently that it will cure diseases. But as the assertion carries no conviction with it, I would ask how it happens that the same sensitive persons (being strangers) have sat quietly beside me, and felt nothing until my name was mentioned—when they could spring to their feet and declare that they never felt such a "magnetic shock in their lives." It is very evident, therefore, as they felt nothing before my name was mentioned, that the shock in all such cases is a result of their own creating, and not through any "magnetism" attached to such papers, or to myself. All cures, therefore, that may have been thus effected were the result of a statuolence power within themselves, which a proper education could have fully developed and rendered useful at will, instead of depending upon a myth, or on others, for that which was within themselves: Statuolence, to be perfectly understood, requires demonstration as well as personal instruction, and, although many have entered the state naturally, they are generally ignorant of their powers, as well as of how to develop their possible qualities. Religious excitement, joy, fear, grief, a belief in the powers of men on spirits, &c., have produced the condition, as well as electro-magnetic machines, &c., but to become a statuolence they must be educated up to the possibilities of the condition, and then only can they be of any use to themselves or others.

In addition to the instructions already given for entering the conditions, there are others of vast importance to those who have entered the state from whatever cause, and desire to become perfect in the art. When persons, therefore, desire to learn how to render the body insensible, they must be directed (when in the condition) to awaken the head only. This being accomplished, the body will be in an insensible state, and it will be impossible to inflict pain upon any part of it, although the head is in a natural condition. An act of their own will, however, can render any part sensitive, independent of the rest, and they can then also let it fall back into the insensible state again in an instant, if so disposed.

In practising this art, we usually direct the patient to awaken, a hand, or an arm, by an act of his own will, and then, by the same power, to let it fall back into the condition again. A little practice will soon enable people to effect this very readily, and they will then be able at any time to throw any part of the body into or out of the state at pleasure.

The possession of this power by those who are engaged in war, or are exposed to accidents, would not only prevent human suffering, but save thousands of limbs, as well as lives, that now are destined to perish.

But this subject is as endless as it is beneficial, and until public attention is directed to its importance, and its possibilities exercised to their full extent, humanity will be obliged to suffer the consequences of a neglect as ruinous as it is unfortunate.

OBSESSION.—At Rians, a young man, just liberated from his military service, on resuming his work as a modeller in his father's shop, had to leave it and lie down from a sense of utter fatigue, when he was seized with a fit. His body was twisted about, he rolled, he leapt high into the air; and it required the strength of half-a-dozen men to hold him. On the fit going off, he was calm and rational. He had frequent attacks like this. One night the doctor prescribed a calming dose for him. When it was brought to him he said, "You want to give him morphine, but he shall not take it." Whatever he said in the attack was spoken as if by another individual through his mouth. I went in once when he was just out of a fit, and he said to me, as he pointed to the foot of his bed, "See! there he is who is making me suffer! He is mocking at your powerlessness; but you are many, can't you protect me?" Some of the neighbours said that he was possessed of the devil. The vicar came and read exorcising prayers with him. Some dolts said that it was all a farce. I took a friend, a medium, of the same age as the patient, with me, and he had a pleasant and rational conversation with him for some time; after which these fits, which had recurred from time to time for a month, suddenly ceased. He did take a little medicine prescribed by Dr. Fabre, who called the terrific attacks crises nerveuses.—Revue Spirite.

THE "UNCONSCIOUS SECONDARY SELF."

BY HENRY KIDDLE.

The opponents of Modern Spiritualism have, at various periods in the history of the movement, shown a great deal of ingenuity in the invention of mysterious agencies, physical or psychical, and in the coinage of terms, sometimes equally mysterious, in order to rule out what is called the spirit theory in the phenomena called spiritual. Thus the abnormal nerve force of the Rev. Dr. Samson, and the "psychic force" of Sergeant Cox and others, played a prominent part for a time in the illogical effort to explain away truth by the conceived operation of an agent whose existence could not be proved.

The latest attempt of that kind is made by one of the members of the London Psychical Research Society—Mr. F. W. H. Myers—in the May number of the Proceedings of that Society. In a lengthy, learned, and ingenious article on "Automatic Writing," which contains a large amount of matter of great interest to Spiritualists, he certainly pushes the telepathic theory, or principle, to a very great extreme in his effort to use it as a means of eliminating spirit agency from phenomena which have usually been attributed to that source. He says: "Telepathy is among the supernormal activities in which we have reason to suspect the operations of an unconscious or secondary self."

It will be observed that this language is very guarded:—"we have reason to suspect" is, assuredly, a cautious expression; and we have no objection at all to an "unconscious secondary self" reasonably suspected; but we do object to the subsequent treatment of it as an actual entity having a demonstrated existence. The suspicion should be verified scientifically before it is so employed; for we need not tell Mr. Myers or the Psychical Research Society that a suspicion is not a fact.

So with the peculiar device of a certain order of scientific men who seem to think that when they have applied a long and learned term to some unaccountable phenomenon, they have fully explained it; but, as "LIGHT" properly says: "a name even of six syllables explains nothing"; and even Dr. Hammond's wonderful word syggismocism is only to be considered as a cacophonous progeny of the verbal-parturient scientific mind.

There are many things in human nature which psychical research will have to grapple with for centuries before it gets beyond the fringe of the mystery surrounding them; and one would be very sanguine to believe that it will be ever able to pluck out the heart of that mystery. Philosophers may talk of "mentation," "cerebration"—conscious and unconscious—"telepathy," "thought-transference," with all the other occult phenomena which they have scientifically labelled; but as yet they have scarcely approximated to a solution of the problems involved in these latent activities, or processes of human nature. Mr. Myers speaks of them as "supernormal"; but we think them neither above law, nor in violation of law (abnormal), but in accordance with laws (normal), the operation of which is not understood. They are not the less normal, because they are not more frequently or commonly displayed and observed. Up to our time, psychical exploration has been superficial, and has not found "reason to suspect" the existence of such activities. Now it does "suspect"; and if it is logical and truly scientific, it will go on to test and prove, instead of "begging the question," making suspicion and hypothesis the basis of learned and ingenious ratiocination, as useless as a chain that is loose at both ends.

The duality of man's nature, we have often affirmed as the result even of our own thought and experience, in addition to the well-attested phenomena that seem clearly to indicate it; and the reason which Mr. Myers has for suspecting the existence of an "unconscious secondary self" may be good and sound; but, at this stage of his inquiry he is not logical in substituting this supposititious agency for the foreign intelligence which, in innumerable phases of manifestation, mental and physical, declares itself to be a disembodied spirit; and there have been many inquirers—and sceptical inquirers, too—who have made an exhaustive examination of these manifestations, and become logically convinced that to accept this declaration—in view of all the facts—was the only truly just and scientific proceeding. Hence, Spiritualists have a right to repel all insinuations that they have been hasty, irrational, or credulous in their adoption of the "spirit theory."

The obvious and undeniable existence and manifestation of a foreign intelligence in such phenomena have been, in part, the basis of verification used by Spiritualists; but Mr. Myers has arbitrarily attributed to his suspected "unconscious secondary self" a capacity of intelligence truly supernormal, and absolutely incredible. Even anagrams, he asserts, can be written automatically by it, such as the following:—neb 16 ebliy ev 86 e earf ee, meaning, "Believe by fear even! 1866." This was written by means of a planchette in answer to the question, "How shall I believe?" And Mr. Myers believes that this answer was given in the form of that complex anagram as an "unconscious reflex from the writer's mind"—or by the "unconscious secondary self." He gives to this mysterious agent the key to unlock all the "stores of unconscious memory," whose extent in any individual's mind it is impossible definitely to limit, so as to say positively what is and what is not there; and then he says, with some dogmatism:—

"There is really no line which can be consistently laid down beforehand as demarcating self-inspired from extraneously-inspired messages, except the presence in such messages of definite pieces of information such as, in a court of justice, it would be considered possible to prove that the writer or speaker could never have possessed."

It will be clearly seen within what narrow limits, under these strange and novel assumptions, it would be possible to verify any spirit communication, however copious the "tests" which it might afford. We must prove that the "definite pieces of information" contained in it could not have been among the "stores of unconscious memory" in the mind of the medium and all others present, and prove it, too, by judicial evidence. As Spiritualists, and in view of the records of Spiritualism, we are willing even to accept those hard conditions, with confidence that we can still prove that "extraneously-inspired messages" have been given; but, at the same time, we hold those conditions to be, in a measure, ingeniously absurd and illogical, inasmuch as they leave out, from the want of spiritual perspicacity on the part of their inventor, some of the most important considerations bearing upon the verification and identification of the spirit intelligences.

Grant the existence and the alleged capabilities of this suspected "unconscious secondary self"; and psychism takes the place of Spiritualism. If this unconscious agency within human nature can construct anagrams, it will be difficult to fix a limit to its alleged powers. It may rap, tip the table, materialise its hand, face, or full form, get between slates and achieve a psychograph, and, in short, go through the whole gamut of the so-called spirit manifestations. The only obstacle to this conclusion is, this suspected agency is not yet proved to have any existence beyond the conception of the psychical researchers or of Mr. Myers; but when this obstacle is removed, the Psychical Research Society will be functus officio, for the mysteries of Spiritualism will have been, not explained, but explained away.

A PUZZLE FOR METAPHYSICIANS.

The following narrative of a vision and its verification is from the pen of Mrs. H. W. Baker, in Harper's Monthly Magazine. In reproducing it we have only omitted redundancies of expression.

In November, 1854, writes Mrs. Baker, the ship "Sophia Walker," Captain Codman, sailed from Boston, bound for Palermo, Italy. On board was the Rev. C. Walker, who had been prescribed a voyage for the benefit of his health; he was a relative of the owners. With him was the Rev. C. Stetson's son Frederic, both of Medford, Mass., who was also recommended a voyage for a similar reason. The latter went on board resolved to take the active duty of a seaman, with the understanding that if he found himself unequal to the work he should take that of captain's clerk. We knew the circumstances through the young man's family being on intimate terms with our own.

Towards the end of 1856, when the "Sophia Walker" had been away two years, I had (continues Mrs. Baker) a nearly fatal attack of pulmonary hemorrhage. One night, when slowly recovering, a nursing friend, Mrs. Butters, left my bedside, to be relieved by my husband. I had taken my medicine, and was composing myself for sleep, when a vision came before me of a ship pitching heavily in a tumultuous sea, and a man whom I recognised as young Frederic Stetson falling into the seething waves. I heard the roaring of the waters, and the shouts of the captain and crew. "Throw a rope!" "Let go the life-buoy!" "Let down the lifeboat!" "No use; he's out of reach!" "He's gone!"

I groaned, and said to my husband, who asked me if he should send for the doctor, "It's dreadful! it's awful!" Then the storm seemed to have passed away, and I saw the crew seated before the Rev. Mr. Walker, who was preaching to them about the solemn event.

The scene then changed to my own room, into which a messenger came with a letter, announcing the death of Frederic Stetson.

The scene then changed back to the "Sophia Walker." The Rev. Mr. Stetson was standing by an open chest containing the belongings of his son. The captain spoke of his good qualities, and told the father of the circumstances of the danger, of all hands being called to help in working the ship, of his son being blown and washed off the yard-arm.

My vision agitated me. I told my husband what I had seen, and that I had no doubt that Frederic Stetson was drowned. He thought I had been thinking of the Stetsons, and that what I called a vision was only a dream. But I was so positive that he made a note of it and the time—midnight, of the 10th of March, 1856.

A fortnight after, on the 25th, the "Sophia Walker" came into port, when Captain Codman communicated the circumstances of the death of Frederic Stetson. His account corresponded exactly with my vision. I had communicated it to my physician, Dr. Swan, and to several friends who visited me in my illness. Dr. Swan during his life frequently urged me to publish the facts, but I was reluctant. Agreeing at length to do so, I have written this narrative, and have asked the principal of those to whom I related my vision, before its verification, to correct any error they may find in my recollection, and they testify to its correctness.

Appended to Mrs. Baker's narrative are testimonies to this effect from Mrs. Stetson, the mother of the drowned young man; of the daughter of the Rev. D. Osgood, Mr. Stetson's predecessor in the pastorate of his church; of Mrs. Butters, a member of the Rev. Mr. Baker's church, who nursed Mrs. Baker in her illness; and of the Rev. Mr. Baker himself, who writes:—

"I bear my testimony to the fidelity of the record of the facts narrated. I consider them among the most remarkable mental phenomena I have any knowledge of, and worthy of a place in the history of metaphysical science."

The final testimony is presented in the following extract from the printed sermon preached by Rev. C. Walker on board the "Sophia Walker," and which he subsequently published:—

"We have the illustration of the quick vanishing of life at hand. Where is the youthful Frederic Stetson? Who of us will forget the night of the 10th? The wind and storm had prevailed for hours; midnight came; all hands were called; the foretop sail must be taken in; with the rest Frederic climbed the yard; the flapping sail, only clewed up, driven by the wind, struck him into the raging sea beneath. The cry, 'Overboard!' was heard. The captain called for the life-buoy to be cut away, the life-boat to be lowered, but we saw how vain it was, for he was lost to our sight," &c., &c.

REVIEWS.

"SYMPNEUMATA."

(FROM ANOTHER POINT OF VIEW.)*

Among the charges brought against this book by your reviewer, one was that it betrayed "inability to recognise the reality of the soul, or of any principle in man capable of subsisting independently of the physical organism."

Now, certainly, so long as the individual perceives, and is perceived, under the form of space, the organism of the new man belongs to the domain of physics in the extended acceptance of that term; though as mediating the powers of a higher consciousness, it will far more govern that domain than be governed by it. It is also true that in "Sympleumata" we do not hear of the soul as an individual entity to be defined, or talked about without being defined, as distinct from the evolutionary processes which tend to consciousness. The spiritual consciousness is not in this book conceived as independent of any organic basis. But from beginning to end we hear of the inner organism which mediates it, the first individual reaction upon the Divine principle, or "God hidden in the central will." The whole effort of the spiritual life is to ultimate this inner organism as the outward nature and expression of the human being. The higher emotions which give impulse to the spiritual will would then be recognised as distinctly and organically sensational, whereas now they seem to belong to a less constant and less real experience. Consciousness has its chief seat in the order which is most firmly and objectively organised. The soul is an ideal in process of realisation, and so must be dynamically, rather than statically, conceived in relation to the ultimate degree of consciousness. Its static existence is just such organic fulcrum of further operation as it has already attained in consciousness. Only thus, at least, can we conceive it in identical connection with the self-consciousness of the earthly man. There is nothing, I believe, in this book inconsistent with that doctrine which, in common with the reviewer, I hold to be the truth, that successive personal or terrestrial existences contribute to the experience and purification of the individual parent of them all. But that hypothesis requires that these derivative personalities shall progressively tend to the full self-conscious representation of the true subject. With every approach to this consummation the personality is so far "atoned." That is to say, by the development in earth life of the interests we call spiritual, the self-consciousness of the personal Ego is merged and identified with that for the sake of which it came into existence. Now, if we acknowledge that this spiritual consciousness has an organic basis of its own, we shall see that the distinction from it of the lower Ego is just the existence of a lower and more external organism (every organic constitution being merely a relatively fixed association of conscious states). The atonement of the personal Ego is the solution of this inferior platform of consciousness. Such solution is only possible through the increased energy of the influx from the superior organism, and this efficacious energy again can only be acquired by a growth and maturity of the heretofore transcendently organic consciousness under conditions and by means which the doctrine of Reincarnation, rightly understood, should explain. This full in-statement of the higher consciousness is now its descent from its former interiorly subjective position to become the external, sensitive, and instinctive basis of the life, thus making room for a new evolutionary process of the inexhaustible Divine energies from within. We shall thus always have a "soul," but not always the same soul consciousness, for the Divine life in us will still be forcing outwards, or ultimating, its successive products, that these may be receptive forms of higher influx.

Every such completed transposition would be the beginning of a new order of human experience. An old ideal has been realised in a new psychical nature. Were this result to be merely individual, the progressed entity would cease to belong to this sphere of manifestation; it would not be reborn into a world or objective order, its affinities with which had entirely ceased.

But how would the case stand were the evolution no longer simply individual, but were that of a foremost wave of humanity on earth, representing a long ideal and social preparation? On that supposition we should have permanently among us a race which the less advanced would regard as superhuman, but which would be a type tending rapidly to become normal in mankind. Now it should be sufficient to refute every charge of materialism against "Sympleumata" that it contemplates this change in the physical constitution of the race as the result of moral and ideal causes. The true body is the expression of the consciousness for the time being, and corresponds to its quality.

The great change in consciousness to which all moral progress tends is the living sense of human solidarity. The phenomena of sympathy, practical philanthropy, absorption of the mind in social problems, the growing dissatisfaction with self-centred interests, these latter-day tendencies are merely the consciousness of a development which has been proceeding unconsciously throughout the ages till they have at length attained the organic stage to which consciousness always testifies. That is to say, the tendency is now recognised for what it is, whereas in its earlier stages the humanitarian instinct had to work unknown by means of agencies which seemed self-seeking merely. "Sympleumata" traces with philosophical insight and powerful expression the workings of this force as it appeared first in the practical energies of representative men; then in the growth of the moral consciousness and in intellectual systems, till in the ultimate process of its descent it reveals itself under new organic conditions of sensibility. Beginning in instinctive impulse towards asserting and maintaining human solidarity in the external order, its efforts in this direction next attain more conscious recognition in institutions, laws, and moralities. The intellectual progress which succeeds advances further the humanitarian impulse, or rather is the symptom and expression of its advance. But the epoch of pure thought can only attain the distinct self-conscious statement of the problem of human life, and despairs of solution just because it discovers that not in itself does the solution lie. And there we must remain, unless a new order of positive experience can impose its mandate on the interpretative functions of intelligence, refusing to be ignored. The intellect of science recognises only a sensational basis for its facts, for it must always belong to the external and objective order. It does not yet know that even a slight shifting of the organic "threshold" of sensibility, discloses a new order of positive and irrefragable experience, by unfolding new faculties of sensible apprehension. It will accept no testimony to such experience, although from its own adopted principles of biological evolution that should be anticipated.

In the fine and impressive chapter on "Intellect," this inadequacy of mind to transcend or anticipate experience is powerfully stated. Strange as to many it must seem, the "men of light and leading," those who carry intellectual culture and scientific attainment to their highest points, are not in the van of evolutionary progress, and "cannot be considered as the special children of the movement, as the products of its most marked forces, nor as the heralds of the next departure. . . . For those who put forth the pretension to lead, and who mainly are the most followed and admired, are at this hour not men and women with the hidden fire that propels mind and destiny in the mass, but men and women of the luminous intellect which feeds itself from without, which collates experience, but cannot produce it; which dissects the seats of force, but does not transmit it; which registers, classifies, and averages observable facts and acts, but has no sense prophetic of different possibilities; which is, despite the unquestionable grandeur of its proportions, and the vastly increasing numbers of its possessors, nevertheless that class of intellect which marks the close of a long growth-cycle, and will not produce another. It is the intellect which stands with its back to all the future. . . . The phase into which science has most recently entered cannot be the phase out of which fresh sciences will spring; for science in this novel mood comes to kill nature if she can—comes to forbid that men shall feel in other ways than those she has made note of, and therefore comes arresting, if she can, those new activities which grow from new sensations. Science to-day is so absorbed in investigating that world of past experience to which it ostentatiously confines itself, that it denies the right of fresh experience to exist. It would strangle the future rather than allow the free development of forces with which it has not learned to deal. That portion of the high intellectual movement of our day which, though a small portion, is the most remarked, and that part of the science which, though a small part, seizes hold most vigorously of popular imagination, have grown to tyrannies, and intellectuality and science govern now, as churches and old empires have governed in their time, a race of slaves, and govern also by sheer force. For the fear of controverting the statements and conclusions of the sciences begins to paralyse the individuality growth in the larger mass of intelligent people, who dare not give free play to their own pure impulses of intuition and perception, lest they incur the ridicule, censure, or contempt that fall upon those who worship not at the popular shrine. . . . The true genius of the human family is not that which shines; it is growing quietly to be the form which will receive and redistribute the spiritual powers that are fast germinating now throughout the universal human breast, and makes no claim to power as mind alone." To the question which here naturally arises: By what new experience, then, is this statement substantiated? the book is a reply. That reply is, in a single sentence, "personal sentiment of universal quality" (p. 252). "The sense that formerly lay smothered, by weight of limitations and impediments, in widely isolated and suffering souls, the sense of human oneness, has become a common and familiar birthright to numbers that have increased within this century in a truly marvellous proportion throughout all highly developed communities; and the numbers, yet uncounted, who hold through inherited form the latent force of this high sense, and have not drawn it to the perceptive regions of the outer sensation, constitute an unconscious reserve in the embattlement for right which awaits only, for the most part, a touch more of spontaneous vigour, or a ray more of clear apprehension, to spring to the vast activities which this sense propels" (p. 253).

In order to understand the connection between the manifestation of consciousness which gives its title to the book with the social or humanitarian impulse, it is essential that the full metaphysical significance of the latter should be apprehended.

"The proposition now with which the deepest intuitions of all ardent natures challenge the world, to test and prove it in experience, is that the absoluteness of human nature constitutes throughout the world one thing, not many; that therefore, no men as units or as groups can sustain within themselves active forces issuing from another motive than one humanitarian, without impairing the quality of their humanness" (p. 218).

"The question of how personal satisfaction shall be possessed, is closed; and reopens as the demand for possession by his larger self, his entire race, of life capacity for perfectness of joy" (p. 273).

Now all this, through the strictly logical, and thus necessary development of the most elementary germ of sympathy between man and man, implies a community of life at once essential and organic. It was essential from the first; the consciousness of it is its organic effectuation. By the light, now ideally visible, of this consummation of human progress on this earth—for with yet higher attainments this book is not concerned—we can read into history the unity of its purpose, and see in all its bewildering revolutions and anarchies, its wars and politics, the steady pressure of an unitary life-principle against resisting, but retreating individualism. How each one who has found this life-principle can cultivate it "against all odds of outer influence and lower inclination," so that "his moral stature adds to itself growth upon growth with a rapidity proportional to his ready obedience to the claim of each Divinely tyrannical impulse" is well and eloquently set forth in many noble passages.

But the chief thing is that the altruistic motive which has heretofore been regarded as a special virtue, an adornment of the moral life, is now to be recognised as the essential principle of true humanity, the characteristic quality and demand of a consciousness really human.

Now if it is essential humanity that is hereafter to be expressed in the individual consciousness, the first evidence of this being the negation of self-centred individuality which such a development implies, nothing can be wanting in this new consciousness which belongs to the true and complete conception of man. Thus much we can say, a priori. For, on the hypothesis, it is now a metaphysical life principle that has diffused itself through consciousness so as even to find expression in organic sensibility. The metaphysical is no longer metempirical, and therefore even to sensation and perception must be revealed whatever belongs to the vitality thus derived. Every faculty translates its life into its appropriate form and representation, and, therefore, we are not to be startled by the statement that sense will personify that which, metaphysically conceived, can only be distinguished as a principle. For it is the function of sense to dramatise, to give us an object, a representation. Such representations are as real as any representations can possibly be, but we must remember that they are only the sense-form of cognition. The very same reality may inspire a philosophical idea, or may manifest in an exalted emotion, or take form of beauty to the senses. If the Divine nature or force is biune, and man is God derived, this essential biunity will be present in his now-found consciousness of true humanity. And if that consciousness extends to outer sense, the latter will deal with it in its own mode, as sensational recognition or even objective representation. Thus the woman as soul principle, becomes for sense a woman, but for sense only. But further consideration on the "Sympleumata," and some other points, must be reserved for a concluding article.

THE DÆMON OF DARWIN. The Biogen Series. No. 2. Professor Coues. Boston: Estes and Laurial, 1885. May be ordered through the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, S.W.

When Professor Elliott Coues put forth his well-known "Biogen: A Speculation on the Origin and Nature of Life," I had the pleasure of introducing through these columns that little work to English Spiritualists. It seemed to me to contain within its sixty-six pages of dainty quarto as much sense, insight, and instruction as I had found in many a more pretentious volume of ten times the size. I am glad to find that the publishers have arranged with Dr. Coues to bring out under his editorial direction a "series of concise essays on live questions of the day, or of historical research in Religion, Science and Philosophy, prepared by writers of the most eminent ability." There can be no question of the value and interest of such a series if the level of the first volume can be maintained.

The second volume is also from the pen of Professor Coues. It was originally prepared as a memorial address to be delivered from the chair of Anatomy of the National Medical College at Washington, at the opening of the session, October 2nd, 1882, and we have it without material alteration. It must have been, I cannot but think, with some considerable surprise that the Professor's audience listened to this lively jeu d'esprit, to what he himself calls "these anagogies, veiling from the unwise the first principles of biology." In style as well as in matter the address is as little like the dull and respectable orthodoxy of science as can well be conceived.

The form is dramatic. The scene opens with the burial of Darwin in Westminster Abbey. The verdict of science as delivered through the mouth of the President of the Royal Society, Professor Huxley, stamps the value of Darwin's life-achievements.

Scene two is laid in the underworld. Darwin descends into Hades, and witnesses the transformations of matter from Moner to Man, the evolution of a human body. He sees the processes at which he had in the main correctly guessed: or rather which he had in a measure demonstrated to his fellows. But he had perforce stopped there. Into the future of man when freed from the body he had not penetrated. He was now to follow the transubstantiation of matter from the corporeal to the spiritual state:—the evolution of the human soul. How his Dæmon (Socrates) teaches him, must be learned from the book itself. No extracts for which I have space would convey any fair idea of the dialogue.

Scene three is in the overworld again. Socrates and Darwin converse, and the Socratic method is applied, with abundant humour and skill, to test the Darwinian theory of evolution. Here is Darwin's summation of his faith.

SOCRATES.—"Do thy disciples search a Psyche in the body? Do they think of man's undying destiny?"

DARWIN.—"Do they not, they miss the spirit of my teachings: and the laws of Nature, couched in all phenomena of life, have no significance for them. There must have been the time, the place, where Being from Not-being came. There must have been the origin of life, in time and place alike unknown. To this not science nor philosophy applies, but idle speculation drifting, unintelligent, or reverent faith as futile. Nor am I one with those who, bringing all things out of nothing, would discourse too knowingly of Deity: nor yet with those who, fatuous, would bring all things to nought by stripping them of meaning.

But, given cosmic continuity of Being, I would seek the processes by which a something is evolved from something antecedent, and the orderly unfolding of embodied life from simplest animated particles to bodies most complex—man As the end of evolutionary process is not yet, science will wisely set no limit to the possible, presuming not to say what form and substance Psyche may assume in future states of being—what Logos Nous may execute."

SOCRATES.—"Darwin, 'Thou reasonest well.'"

The Recent Controversy.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It is to be hoped that your readers will understand that if the challenge offered by "G. D. Haughton" is left unanswered, it is not because the answer is "not easy," for it is at once easy and sufficient, but simply because you have decided to close the discussion. Permit me to suggest that, in view of this decision, it would have been a better course to omit a letter which raises new issues, and bases on them a challenge which we are precluded from accepting—a letter, too, which shows that the writer totally misconceives our position.

As Mr. Tomlinson's letter is based in great part upon Dr. Wyld's report of certain remarks alleged to have been made by me, it ought not to have been written—still less published—until opportunity had been afforded me for correction or confirmation. As it is, all that part of his letter falls to the ground in view of the contradiction I have given in the current number of "LIGHT."—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD MAITLAND.

C. C. C.—The correspondence is closed. For one reason we regret this, as you bring forward excellent reasons why such a controversy is unsuitable for the columns of "LIGHT." We regret the mistake which caused you to say that "it was open to doubt the mystic sense of the Gospels," instead of to "dwell upon," but even in your present letter we should have read "doubt" instead of "dwell"—the formation of the letters being hardly distinguishable from each other in both cases.

T. MAY.—We regret we cannot find room for your letter. See footnote in last week's "LIGHT."

Nor by lamentations and mournful chants should we celebrate the funerals of the good, but by joyful hymns; for in ceasing to be numbered with mortals, they enter upon the heritage of the diviner life.—Plutarch.

IN MEMORIAM.—Charles Edwin Gilliespy, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, passed onwards, 7th July, 1885, aged twenty-seven years. Mr. Gilliespy was an earnest and devoted Spiritualist. He was secretary to the Newcastle Society for the past year and a-half, and will be greatly missed both for his kindly disposition and the indefatigable manner in which he fulfilled the duties of his office. A considerable number of Spiritualists attended the funeral, and a fitting tribute was paid to his memory at the following Spiritualists' Sunday Services.

A MAGNETIC CURE.—Mrs. Crosby, of Southwark-street, Birmingham, came to me May 10th last. She had been in Paris three months for advice, after the best treatment she could get at home, but in vain. Before returning she had been recommended to try magnetism. Her case was one of atrocious facial neuralgia; her countenance was drawn with frequent accessions of pain, and she complained of sleeplessness and loss of memory. I held out hopes of relief to her, and began at once; I magnetised in the hope that magnetic sleep would come on; I succeeded, but the sleep was not profound, and it was accompanied by some cataleptic rigidity. Next day she confessed to feeling better. We had the same operation with similar effect. Next day she did not come through diarrhoea. I resumed the day after, and for three days we had similar results—sleep with rigidity. On the eighth day I magnetised from head to cardiac plexus only; in five minutes an attack of pain came on which made her frantic, out of which she passed into a state of general cataleptic rigidity. Then I magnetised for sleep. It came on, lasted nearly an hour; then she woke up quite easy and refreshed. This was the end of her attacks. I magnetised no more. She has just written gratefully that she keeps quite well.—H. DURVILLE, Journal du Magnétisme.

CUI BONO?

Of what use is the investigation of the so-called phenomena of Modern Spiritualism? is a question that spontaneously rises to the lips of all thoughtful persons who have not examined the subject, and upon whose attention it is urged for the first time.

The answers may vary according to the intellectual standpoints of the inquirers. To the purely scientific inquirer whose speciality is physics, it may be said that all facts are worthy of examination; that the physical phenomena visible at spiritual seances are as objective and real as are those that take place in the laboratory of the chemist, the studio of the artist, or the work-room of the mechanic; that they may in many cases be tested in the same manner, if not to the same extent, as are tested many of the ordinary phenomena in nature, viz., by sight, hearing, smell, taste, and touch; that, in fact, they appeal to all the senses, and not only to the senses of one man, or class of men, but to all who are present, and are not merely subjective impressions, but objective phenomena. As occult and unusual facts, they are therefore worthy of examination, whatever may be the inferences deducible from the facts.

If there be any reasonable ground for accepting the inferences commonly deduced from so-called spiritual phenomena, then they are worthy of investigation, not merely as physical, but as psychological facts, and point to a field of inquiry in direct antagonism to the prevalent materialism of the age. The ordinary philosophical arguments in defence of a continuity of being after the death of the body, fail to satisfy critical and logical minds that have been trained in biological and physiological sciences. The Old Testament is practically silent as to a future life for man; and the teachings of the New Testament respecting a future state of conscious being, do not, confessedly, commend themselves to the many of the broad and catholic students of nature.

If the facts of Modern Spiritualism satisfactorily prove, as they most certainly do, that there is high intelligence, or, indeed, intelligence of any kind, apart from cerebral organisation, and if, beyond that, the invisible intelligences who communicate, persistently and systematically affirm that they are persons who have been embodied in this world, it is difficult to see how such facts can be logically rejected, and not difficult to see that they are incompatible with Materialism and Positivism, as commonly taught.

To many thousands of moral and spiritually minded men and women these despised phenomena have brought

"life and immortality" to light, and believers in Modern Spiritualism instead of looking to the grave as a hopeless leap in the dark, are cheered by the prospect that death is to the virtuous an immediate portal to a brighter and better condition of being.

If these alleged facts be true it is not difficult to recognise the Cui Bono. The great present want of the world is an assurance as to a future life of absolute justice, reasonable retribution, and unlimited progress, through self-sacrificing efforts for the good of others.

THE HISTORICAL DEVELOPMENT OF THE PSYCHIC FORCE THEORY.

Carl Kiesewetter contributes an article in the July number of Psychische Studien on the theory of psychic force in its historical development. The writer shows that the contention between this theory and that of spirits has existed from very early times. "Clear thinking individuals very soon came upon the idea that the problem of the magical spirit-life could not be satisfactorily solved either by a crass materialism or by an exclusive belief in spirits." The inquiry is then traced from the Alexandrian school of the Neo-Platonists to Avicenna some centuries later (who explained even "physical manifestations" by the action of the soul-force), Albertus Magnus, Roger Bacon, &c. Mention is then made of Peter Panzoni, who systematically expounded the idea in his book "De Incantationibus," written at a time when the witch persecutions in Italy had exceeded all former experience, and explaining the supposed diablerie psychically and astrologically. The similarity of the views of Cornelius Agrippa with those of the modern Theosophists in this respect is remarked. Paracelsus, Van Helmont, and Fludd are likewise all authorities on the magical powers of the (unconscious) soul. Kircher and Caspar Schott in the seventeenth century experimented in this direction, the former's hypnotic investigations with men and animals being worthy of mention. In 1692, the discovery of a murder by means of the divining-rod gave a fresh impulse to Occultism, De Vallemont, in 1696, in his "Physique Occulte," attempting to explain the divining-rod by means of the then dominant Cartesianism. He was opposed by Malebranche and Zeidler, the former representing the then orthodox view. The latter, Johann Gottfried Zeidler, published at Halle, in 1700, his "Pantomysterium, or Year's News of the Divining-rod," a work "full of surprising doctrines, experiments, and truly dumb-foundering researches." It made a great stir, but afterwards, although as late as 1750 attention was again called to it by Martius, it was wholly forgotten under the influence of the Rationalism of the period. Zeidler explained the phenomenon of movement by psychic force, and gave striking confirmation of his theory by actual experiment. Subsequent writers favoured the theory of "Siderism," connecting telheric and animal magnetism and astral influences, for the explanation of the movements. In 1857 Bruno Schindler, in his work "Magischen Geistesleben," dealt with all the mediumistic phenomena (then known) from the point of view of Psychism. Between the Materialists and the Spiritualists, Schindler obtained little attention, and "the atmosphere was too much agitated by the battle-thunders of great wars for this tender flower of the intellect to thrive." He is praised as an author "of great logical acuteness, and cyclopedic reading."

"Now that Crookes, Cox, &c., have begun to throw light upon the problem of mediumship, and the tendency of Psychische Studien has won approbation from the most distinguished of living philosophers, Eduard von Hartmann, the time may perhaps have arrived to consider the past history of our theory in the different stages of its development."

With a view to this historical and comparative account, the writer, who has studied the literature in question for twenty years, promises a continuation of his article with the following programme:—1, Particular Theories; 2, Agrippa's System of Psychic Force; 3, Paracelsus and his School as Psychics; 4, The Study of the Phenomena of Movement; 5, Bruno Schindler.

A CORRESPONDENT at Palmerston, New Zealand, informs us, in a postscript to a business letter recently received, that he and some fellow investigators of Spiritualism had witnessed some striking phenomena of late, a table rising, without contact of any one, as high as two feet from the floor, the medium being a half-caste boy, nine years of age.—Harbinger of Light.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

- | | |
|---|---|
| A.—Mesmerism. | K.—Spirit Identity. |
| B.—Trance. | L.—Materialised Spirit Forms. |
| C.—Clairvoyance. | M.—The Spirit Rap. |
| D.—Thought-reading. | N.—The Spirit Voice. |
| E.—Previsional and Coincidental Dreams. | O.—Psychography. |
| F.—Apparitions. | P.—Automatic Writing. |
| G.—The Human "Double." | Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact. |
| H.—Presence at a Distance. | R.—Miscellaneous Phenomena. |
| I.—Haunted Houses. | |

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.]

CLASSES K AND M.—"SPIRIT" IDENTITY AND THE "SPIRIT" RAP.*

It is often said that the communications received from unseen intelligences always partake more or less of the mind of the medium, or at least that the information imparted is within the knowledge of the persons present. To show, however, that this is by no means invariably the case I should like to give you the particulars of a seance held some time ago at the house of a Mr. Mansell, when the messages obtained were in no degree whatever within the knowledge of any of the sitters, but were afterwards satisfactorily verified. The medium on the occasion was Mrs. Everitt—a lady widely known and highly esteemed amongst Spiritualists for her self-sacrificing devotion to the cause—and the company included Mr. Everitt, myself, and wife, Mr. Mansell, and two or three personal friends of his, all being well-known to each other. I ask your attention to the name of Mr. Mansell, because on that will hang some of the interest of my narrative.

We were sitting under the full blaze of a gas chandelier when some loud raps came upon the table. Mr. Everitt endeavoured to get the name of the spirit spelt out, several times without success. I suggested that perhaps the spirit had not communicated before and did not know the usually adopted signals, and I requested that one rap should be given for "No," two for "Don't know," and three for "Yes," and that for other answers the spirit should rap at the letter required while the alphabet was being repeated.

I then asked, "Have you communicated before?"—One loud rap indicated "No."

"Will you endeavour to spell out your name while Mr. Everitt repeats the alphabet?"—Three raps, "Yes."

Mr. Everitt repeated the alphabet very quickly, and I pencilled down the following letters, "T-H-O-M-A-S-M-A-N-S-"

"Oh," I said, "Thomas Mansell! This is a friend of yours, Mr. Mansell." But Mr. Mansell said No, he knew no such person. Nor did anyone else present. The experiment was tried again, with the same result—"T-H-O-M-A-S-M-A-N-S-." I repeated that I had got the same letters as before, when a loud single rap indicated that I was wrong; and so I asked the spirit, letter by letter, how far I was correct. I then found that "T-H-O-M-A-S-M-A-N" was right; and when the alphabet was again repeated I learnt that after the "N" "T" was intended, and not "S," the letter immediately preceding. The name was then without further difficulty spelt out—"Thomas Manton." Questions put to the friends present satisfied me that no one in the circle had the slightest idea of who Thomas Manton was; and I next asked the spirit to tell me how many years he had been in the other life. The answer came—S-I-X—

* We make no apology for reprinting this case from one of our earliest issues. It is a good case of its kind, and should, we think, now be included in these "Record" columns for the sake of future comparison and tabulation.

"Oh," I said, "six years?"—An emphatic "No."
"Perhaps you mean six years and so many months? Tell us how many?"—Answer, "T-E—"
"Oh, six years and ten months?"—"No."
"Go on."—"T-E-E—"
"Oh, sixteen years?"—Again "No."
"Well, go on."—"H-U-N-D-R-E-D."
"Then you mean that you have been in the other life sixteen hundred years?"—"No."
"Well, try again."—"Sixteen hundred and seventy-seven."
"Do you mean that you have been in the other life sixteen hundred and seventy-seven years?"—"No."
"Do you mean that you entered the other life in the year 1677?"—"Yes."

"Tell us where you were born?"
Answer, "Launceston." Knowing nothing of such a place as this, I asked where it was, and the reply was spelled out correctly and rapidly—"Somersetshire."

"Where were you buried?"—"Stoke Newington." The spirit afterwards told us that he was a Nonconformist divine; was at one time chaplain to Charles II.; was afterwards ejected from the Church and imprisoned; that he could say no more then, but that if we wanted further information we could learn something of him at Wadham College, Oxford. He added, however, that he had been introduced to the seance by a Nonconformist friend whom he had met in the other life, Dr. Jabez Burns, who while in earth-life, had attended some of Mrs. Everitt's seances.

On turning next day to a Clergy List in search of a parish of a name that might bear some resemblance to "Launceston," I found "Laurence Lydiard" in Somersetshire. This gave me some hope that I might find all the rest of the narrative to be correct, and as the readiest method of testing the messages, I requested the Rev. W. W. Newbould, who was in the habit of frequenting the British Museum, to endeavour, if possible, to verify the facts for me, telling him, however, nothing more than that I wanted a brief sketch of the life of Thomas Manton, a Nonconformist divine. The following is the report which Mr. Newbould supplied to me next day, and which, it will be seen, proves the accuracy of the communication in every particular.

[EXTRACT.]

"MANTON (Thomas), a learned Nonconformist minister, was born at Laurence Lydiard, in Somersetshire, in 1620, and educated at the Free School at Tiverton, and at Wadham College, and at Hart Hall, Oxford. He then studied divinity, and was admitted to deacon's orders by the celebrated Dr. Hall, Bishop of Exeter. After preaching for some time at Sowton, near Exeter, and at Colyton, in Devonshire, he came to London, where he was admired for his pulpit eloquence, and about 1643 was presented to the living of Stoke Newington by Colonel Popham, and here preached those lectures on the Epistles of St. James and St. Jude, which he afterwards published in 1651 and 1652. During his residence at Newington he often preached at London, and is said to have preached the second sermon for the Sons of the Clergy, an institution then set on foot, chiefly through the influence of Dr. Hall, son of the bishop, who preached the first. He was also one of those who were called occasionally to preach before the Parliament, but being strongly opposed to the execution of the King, he gave great offence by a sermon in which he touched on that subject. In 1651 he showed equal contempt for the tyranny of the usurpers, by preaching a funeral sermon for Mr. Love, and in neither case allowed the fears of his friends to prevent him from doing his duty. In 1650 he was presented to the living of Covent Garden by the Earl, afterwards Duke, of Bedford, who had a high respect for him. At this church he had a numerous auditory. Archbishop Usher, who was one of his hearers, used to say he was one of the best preachers in England, and had the art of reducing the substance of whole volumes into a narrow compass, and representing it to great advantage. In 1653 he became chaplain to Cromwell. He was nominated also by Parliament one of a committee of divines to draw up a scheme of fundamental doctrines. In the same year he was appointed one of the committee for the trial and approbation of ministers. In 1660 he co-operated openly in the restoration of Charles II., was one of the ministers appointed to wait upon his Majesty at Breda, and was afterwards sworn one of his Majesty's chaplains. In the same year he was, by mandamus, created D.D. at Oxford. In 1661 he was one of the commissioners at the Savoy Conference, and continued preaching until St. Bartholomew's Day, in 1662, when he was ejected for Nonconformity. After this he preached occasionally, either in private or public, as he found it convenient, particularly during the indulgence granted to the Nonconformists from 1668 to 1670, but was imprisoned for continuing the practice when it became illegal. His constitution, although he was a man of great temperance, early gave way; and his complaints terminating in a lethargy, he died October 11, 1677, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, and was buried in the church of the church at Stoke Newington.—H. J. ROSE, New General Biographical Dictionary, vol. ix., pp. 464, 465 (1857).

Here is a clear case of a correct and truthful communication, not one word of which was known to any person in the circle, and which the spirit succeeded in giving in the face of a somewhat persistent, though unintentional, attempt to make him say something else than he wished to say.

EXPERIMENTS WITH THE HYPNOSCOPE.

The July number of Psychische Studien contains much interesting matter. The first article, by Herr Gustav Gessmann, of Vienna, contains an account of experiments with an improved "Hypnoscope," and "an attempt partially to explain the occurrence of abnormal sensations under magnetic influence, on the principle of the magnetic properties of the blood." The original hypnoscope was an invention of the Paris physician, Dr. Ochorowicz, and was designed to detect susceptibility to hypnotism. Without describing the instrument at length, it may be sufficient to state that it was a magnetised steel tube, with positive and negative poles, in which the subject of the experiment inserted a forefinger. Out of a hundred persons about thirty experienced different kinds of sensations, such as cold or warmth, prickings, twitchings, or swellings of the finger, &c.; and it was found that persons thus sensitive were also capable of being hypnotised. By strengthening the magnetic power of the instrument Herr Gessmann has obtained remarkable results, though no sufficient confirmation of the relation alleged by his predecessor between magnetic sensibility and predisposition to hypnotism. Of 130 persons experimented upon (76 males and 54 females), no less than 86 (54 males and 32 females) proved sensitive to the more strongly magnetised instrument. The sensations were classified as follows:—

Feeling of a cool wind	16 persons
Quiet coolness	26 "
Electrification	29 "
Spasms up to the arm	7 "
Pressure all round the finger	2 "
Feeling of warmth	6 "

Thus Herr Gessmann found two-thirds of his subjects sensitive, as against Dr. Ochorowicz's one-third.

He further discovered that among the female subjects the sensibility to the instrument was much less during, or shortly after, a physiological period.

Further, that hypnoscopes of different magnetic power being used with one and the same person, under otherwise similar conditions, the resulting sensations did not differ in degree, but in kind.

Herr Gessmann recognises the necessity for further experiments to establish two of his results; but in the fact that loss of blood diminishes sensibility to the instrument, taken in connection with the known magnetic properties of the blood (arterial blood being paramagnetic and positive, venous blood being diamagnetic and negative) he finds a clue to the partial explanation of the abnormal sensations. Yet he concludes that disturbances of the circulation do not alone suffice to explain the phenomena observed by means of the hypnoscope. And he considers this instrument well adapted to establish the much contested fact of magnetic influence on the body; but that its value as a test of susceptibility to hypnotism is very doubtful.

[If, however, the former conclusion is true, animal magnetism, or the specific influence of mesmerism, being proved, and being the same fact, it seems antecedently probable that susceptibility to the magnetism of the hypnoscope would indicate susceptibility to animal magnetism, though not to those processes of hypnotism, in the restricted sense of the term, which do not imply the influence of one person on another.]

The experiments are still in progress.

THE burial of our bodies is a sublime liberation: we rise from our grave astonished that we thought we had fallen into it.—VICTOR HUGO.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XXXIX.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The open discussion in the religious newspapers about the reality of the faith-cures is a good thing. The Lancet naturally takes part in it. Most doctors believe, or profess to believe, in the miracles of healing about A.D. 30, but they are not disposed to credit those of the succeeding centuries. People are cured—but it is in a natural way, by the excitement of hope, expectation, or other impression made upon the nervous system. "Faith-cures," so-called, or "mind-cures," are not, therefore, supernatural—but if natural, why do not the doctors manage to have more of them?

What the Lancet says comes to about this: "It is the faith that heals, not the hypothetical source or object of faith outside the subject of faith. Nothing, in fact, is done for the believer. His act of believing is the motor force of his cure. An exercise of faith as a rule suspends the operation of adverse influences, and appeals strongly through the consciousness to the inner and underlying faculty of vital force. There is no miracle, therefore, in faith-healing, nothing beyond an active assistance of the ordinary powers of nature." A vital force always doing the best it can—always working for cure—closing wounds, uniting broken bones, trying always to restore the body to its natural conditions. In some cases the doctors help, in many they hinder. As a rule, the less they interfere the better for the patient.

A friend sends a cutting from a Missouri newspaper, charging a "Dr. Slade" with grievous impostures and crimes. America is a very large country—about twenty times the size of the United Kingdom, and scattered among its 40,000,000 of population are several scamps who do not hesitate to pass themselves off as "Dr. Slade," or any one who has a reputation which can be stolen. The Banner of Light is constantly warning people against such impostors.

Mr. Colville, just before leaving America for England, gave an inspirational discourse on Esoteric Buddhism, which is reported at length in the Banner of Light. He said: "The whole sum and substance of Esoteric Buddhism is that man must conquer self in order to rise to his true elevation as lord and master of the material universe. We must all feel humiliated as we witness the dominion which the beast has over man. Man, as sovereign over the three kingdoms of nature below him, must eventually have supreme power over every order of lower being. Snake-charming and lion-taming are perfectly natural; man's will being superior to an animal's or reptile's, ought to be able to govern these lower creatures. Psychology explains all such marvels, but the adept's art is nothing which outward initiatory rites or acquaintance with theories can convey. There are many people whose faith in psychology is unflinching, who have literally no psychologic power themselves, while others who have never heard the word employ the power."

Our power is the result of what we are, and of that alone. What we believe is of no consequence, except in so far as it changes us and makes us the possessors of power unattainable without certain knowledge. The secret of adeptship is, after all, simply a secret very easy to state but very hard to win, and that is the attainment of a condition where everything in ourselves, corresponding to the lower life around us, is completely in subjection to our soul-life. Strong motives, powerful will, resolute self-control, may be exercised by black magicians as well as by those who are of pure intent; but only can one attain to the heights of Nirvana and become one with Deity when every thought, motive and aspiration is of the purest. The pure in heart alone perceive Divine truth and become its potent instruments."

Whatever "Saladin" may say, there are Secularists who have become Spiritualists—at least they have examined the phenomena said to be produced by spirits and have declared them genuine. George Chainey does not stand alone in this matter. A leading Secularist presided some time ago with dignity and grace at a Spiritualist meeting held at Liverpool.

The town of Liberal, Missouri, is a Secularist settlement. Religious people are not excluded, but they are not encouraged. Five citizens have made a careful examination of slate-writing, and signed an affidavit that they made a thorough examination. They pronounce it utterly impossible that it was done by other than spirits. A practising physician of the town makes a similar affidavit.

General Grant has joined the majority of the army he commanded, and the one he defeated, in spite of faith-healers and mind-curers. It was confidently stated "that he had sought for Divine healing, and was cured"—which is true, perhaps, in a much better way than was intended. Our bodies are "fearfully and wonderfully made," and should be taken good care of. It is good to get out of them no doubt, but, with eternity ahead, why hurry?

The Protestant Standard seems to be in the lowest stratum of anti-Spiritualist newspapers. Spiritualism, according to this Standard, is "nonsensical twaddle," and a "foul deceit of the age," which, if it contain anything in reality, all of it is of the devil. A more monstrous or blasphemous theory could not possibly be advocated. But then, on the other hand, suppose that the facts of Spiritualism are real facts, and you can prove them to be of the devil aforesaid, could there be a greater triumph for Protestant orthodoxy?

Warren Chase, one of the oldest and ablest of American political and social reformers, and now a leading Spiritualist, says: "The world is our church, all people in it are members, and those who know more should teach those who know less, and those who live better and do better be examples for those not as good. We need no bishop, no priest, and no Salvation Army. We are not here to fight, but to teach, and we can afford to let all into our meetings and schools, and not claim to be holier than others. So it looks to me."

SPIRITUALISM IN LONDON & THE PROVINCES.

CAVENDISH ROOMS.—On Sunday last, August 2nd, W. J. Colville addressed large and influential audiences at Cavendish Rooms. Both lectures elicited many signs of approval. Previous to that of the evening, several important questions were ably answered, and at the close of both impromptu poems were delivered. The subject matter of both lectures was extremely interesting and profound. The morning topic, "The Perfect Way; or, the Finding of Christ," steered clear of controverted opinions on the literal history of Jesus, and dealt with the spiritual truth which underlies the letter of the records. To follow conscience, to listen to and obey the highest voice we can hear, is to tread in the path that leads to perfection; to steel our hearts against the moral sense, and to gratify the lower instincts is to grieve the Holy Spirit.—Special Notice.—"Spiritualism and Theosophy."—By particular request of many friends, W. J. Colville will speak at Cavendish Rooms, Mortimer-street, W., on Sunday next, August 9th, in reply to a review of Mr. Sinnett's new work, "Karma," which appeared in the Times of Friday, July 31st. The services commence at 11 a.m. and 7 p.m., precisely. Morning topic, "Karma; or, the Law of Consequence"; evening, "Is Spiritualism an Incentive to a Holy Life, and is it a Practical Religion?" All seats are free.—W. J. Colville will speak in Paris on Sunday evening, August 16th, and following days until August 22nd. All English-speaking persons in that city who are interested in Spiritual matters should apply for particulars to Miss M. B. Baldwin, 28, Rue Washington, who is arranging for the lectures.—W. J. Colville will speak in Cavendish Rooms (probably for the last time) on Sunday, August 23rd; in Leeds, September 6th, 7th, and 8th; in Manchester, September 13th, and in Sheffield, September 14th, 15th, and 16th. Provincial societies can secure his services for Sunday, August 30th, and week evenings not already engaged between August 30th and September 13th. Immediate application should be made to W. J. Colville, 16, York-street, Portman-square, London, W., at which address he is at home to receive friends on Tuesdays from 3 till 6 p.m. All readers of "LIGHT" are most cordially invited. Inspirational replies to questions and impromptu poetry from 3.30 till 5 o'clock.

SPIRITUALISM IN BLACKBURN.—On Sunday last the Spiritualists of Blackburn held their first "Flower Service." The congregation and friends were invited to contribute plants and flowers for the decoration of the hall, and they responded heartily to the invitation. The front of the platform was converted into a miniature gallery upon which the flowers were beautifully and artistically arranged. Mr. A. D. Wilson, of Halifax, was the speaker. In the afternoon his discourse was on "The Floral Preachers," and in the evening on "The Ministry of the Beautiful." In the evening Mr. Wolstenholme in introducing Mr. Wilson spoke of the elevating influence of beautiful objects, whether in nature or art, and hoped to see the day when in every large town, museums and picture galleries would be open to the public on Sundays. Although some present might object to his ideas he had a firm conviction that it was not a sin to run excursions to the sea-side on Sunday, so that toilers in mills and workshops could occasionally see the grand and beautiful sea. There were large audiences at each meeting, and every one was highly pleased with the success of the first Flower Service. The flowers were afterwards presented to the inmates of the Blackburn Infirmary and Blackburn Workhouse.

NEWCASTLE AND NEIGHBOURHOOD.—As was previously announced, Mr. Morse lectured in Newcastle and North Shields from July 19th to 22nd. His lectures were very largely attended, many being anxious to hear him prior to his departure for America, and considerable enthusiasm was evoked. On July 23rd a complimentary tea and farewell meeting was held at Weir's-court, Newcastle, at which a large number of persons were present, and a considerable section of the Shields Society joined the Newcastle friends in paying honour to the guest of the evening, Mr. J. J. Morse. In the course of the proceedings short speeches were delivered by Messrs. McKellar, Appleby, Robson, Wilson, Kersey, Robinson, and Thomson, each of them expressing their appreciation of Mr. Morse's faithfulness to the movement, and the great amount of good which had been accomplished by the teaching of his "guides." The President, Mr. T. Thomson, presented to Mr. Morse, in the name of the members of the Newcastle Society, a purse containing ten guineas, "as a testimonial of their cordial acknowledgment of his untiring, faithful, and earnest devotion to the movement during the long period of sixteen years, and the high estimate at which they valued the eloquent oratorical efforts of his 'guides,' in their advocacy of Modern Spiritualism." Mr. Morse responded in a very feeling manner, as also did his controls, "Tien Sien Tie" and "The Strolling Player." An illuminated address was also exhibited, which had been presented to Mr. Morse at Shields on the day previous. The programme was enlivened with vocal and instrumental music by Mesdames Peel, Miller, and Hales, and Misses Gillespy and Kersey, and Messrs. Kennedy, Young, and L. Sawyer, who rendered a choice selection most charmingly, and greatly heightened the pleasure of the evening. The proceedings terminated with "Auld Lang Syne," by all the company, a hearty vote of thanks having been given to all who had so cordially united to make the gathering so successful and pleasant. Mr. Morse finally passed through a considerable ordeal of hearty hand-shaking, united with earnest wishes of God-speed and for success. Thus closed one of the most memorable gatherings in connection with the Newcastle Society of late years, and one not soon to be forgotten by those present. Mr. Morse and his family sailed from Liverpool in the steamship Wisconsin, for New York, on the following Saturday. We hear that many friends accompanied him on board for the final parting. A telegram from him, dated from Queenstown and conveying his final greetings, was read at the evening services on the following Sunday.—Communicated.

ERRATA.—In Mr. Noel's letter of last week on the Historic Jesus, for "St. Valentinus" read "Valentinus"; and in the sentence "they incur a grave responsibility who attempt to rob our poor work of its chief Consoler," read "world" for "work."

THE Adelaide Times has opened its columns to a lengthy correspondence on Spiritualism, the principal debaters being Mr. Bayner on the Materialist side, Mr. Glaister on the Spiritualist. The South Australian Times has published, in parts, Mr. Bucknell's narrative of sittings with the late Miss Wood.—Harbinger of Light.

THE LONDON SPIRITUALIST ALLIANCE.

CHAMBERS: 16, CRAVEN STREET, CHANCERY CROSS, S.W.

This Society of Spiritualists, founded for the purpose, primarily, of uniting those who share a common faith, and then of giving information respecting that faith to those who seek for it, has now occupied Chambers at the above address. There will be found an extensive Library of works especially attractive to Spiritualists; the various Journals of Spiritualism published in this and other countries; and opportunities of converse with friends like-minded. The Alliance holds periodical Soirées at the Banqueting Hall, St. James's Hall, where papers on interesting phases of the subject are read, and discussion is invited.

Particulars as to Membership (minimum Annual Subscription, One Guinea) may be obtained from the Hon. Sec.,

MORELL THEOBALD,

62, Granville Park, Blackheath, S.E.

The following list, which will be continued by the courtesy of the editor until complete, will show what an important library is now available for use by members of the London Spiritualist Alliance. It is the desire of the Council that the books should be used by Spiritualists, and should not merely be available for consultation in our Chambers. To this end they have made arrangements for their being removed, under certain restrictions, for home reading. The publication of a catalogue in "LIGHT" will place at the disposal of every member a list which will enable him to select at his leisure what he may wish to read. Rules and regulations will be at once drawn up, so that the Library may be available without unnecessary delay.

W. STANTON MOSES, M.A., President.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Friese, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstätt, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Cathness and Duchesse de Pomar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not of yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and, when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1858), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and consistent, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which divers circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest aculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Naylor, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CRONWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception. . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of any legend, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homoeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitations. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis d'Esclapart de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (tout de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

ROBERT HOUDIN.

4th May, 1847.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN.

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 15th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, oder Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the cardinal facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through premeditation to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you, &c., &c."

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitations is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Berne; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877. (Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

SOME ODD "FADS" AND FANCIES; THEIR RATIONALE AND EXPLANATION.

BY S. EADON, M.D.

I.

The genius of humanity is progressive. There was an Alpha in human development, and there will be an Omega; or, in the language of Aristotle, a beginning, a middle, and an end. No power can stop the on-flowings of these waters of human advancement. From a hidden fount they gushed forth by an Omnipotent fiat, and onwards they will roll till lost in the great ocean of an exalted order of being. The spirit of man is enshrined in an embodied form; and the Book of God—star-studded Infinity and ocean-girded Earth—was thrown wide open for its mento-cerebral development. Without a guide to instruct, or a guardian angel to correct, man had to read off, as best he might, the mysterious symbols of creation; and he has read them, and that, too, with wondrous success; but ages have been the term-time for the acquisition. Sometimes he has fallen into grievous blunders; at others, the spark of truth has been elicited by one electric or odic flash of genius. At one time he has been elated with success; at another, he has stood and gazed, and said "Tell me, created symbol, what meanest thou?" But no answer could he get. Night after night would he think, but empty conjecture was often the only pabulum for the future workings of his spirit. By observation and experiment has man invoked nature, and the result has been, more or less, an admixture of truth and error;—mis-interpretation and mal-translation of nature's symbols are apparent in every domain of learning; a thing quite unavoidable, as error is necessarily inherent in the development of spirit, when in connection with organised matter. The thought-to-be truths of one age have been found to be errors in the next; and by refining and analysing processes, repeated again and again, real knowledge has at last been arrived at. Truth is not so deep down in the rock that the hammer of genius cannot break through and bring it to the light; but a certain class of men, endued with conceit, and the pride of place, have, in every age, assumed a superiority over their fellows, and prevented Truth from showing her radiant charms as soon as she might have done. These are they who, in every period, have thought the human mind had reached the acme of its power; that the whole wide universe, in its every form of manifestation, had disclosed all her secrets to the flights of their genius, or to the profundities of their researches. In their estimation, nothing could be developed or known which was not already known to them.

Such has been the history of human progress; and thus has science been impeded and civilisation kept back. Although we live in the latter half of the nineteenth century, this same kind of opposition to a new truth is often yet seen. Men of a certain make of mind hate new ideas, and set their face against them with a determined opposition. Strange to say, this is often the case with men of learning; and the more so, indeed, if the new truth belongs to their own domain of thought. Their self-sufficiency is a complete barrier to the inlet of new ideas. Whatever does not square with their preconceived opinions, or already-packed-up notions, is quackery, charlatanism, sheer nonsense, or something worse. In fact, these men assume a thorough knowledge of the arcana of the universe. In their hand is held the key to the temple of all knowledge. The laws of matter—whether of atom or of world—the laws of mind, of cerebro-maturation, or of spirit, whether through an ordinary medium, or through media-extraordinary, are alike familiar to them. They are the godmen of this earth, and cannot be fished (as the Scotch say) with the impertinence of even a fresh suggestion in the domain of science unless from themselves. They are the great "I am" of every age; those who alone can peer into the future, as well as tell of the doings of the past. There they stand, like a mighty Teneriffe, as if the vast sea of rolling events and ever-developed phenomena, surging at its base in ever-ceaseless foam, was always in a state of perfect calm. Nothing seems to affect them; neither the experience of past ages, nor the changes of public opinion, nor the rise of unheard-of forms of knowledge, nor the evolution of new relationships, as startling in their results as they are grand in intellectual conception. There they remain, solid as granite and impenetrable as adamant. Surely such incarnations of self-esteem cannot always remain unaffected by the clash of circumstances and the rush of new thoughts which flood them on every side. At the present time mines of fresh strata of thought are continually being opened up, sparkling with diamonds of matchless beauty. From the artesian wells of a dogged perseverance, lit up with the star of genius, bubble up, ever and anon, streams of ideas, bright, lovely, and fresh as if direct from the throne of God. Nothing is still. The world of mind is shaken to its very centre. Change is now the characteristic of everything. The old in thought, feeling, and affection is lost in the coming-in-tide of that which is fresh, and new, and startling.

We see the truth of these remarks in the reception, by the scientific men of our day, of the discovery of a new force by Baron Reichenbach, which he has called "OD," and which is thought to be different from caloric, light, heat, electricity, magnetism, or any other dynamic influence at present known. Although this new force is highly refined and attenuated, and requires parties who are "sensitives" born, to perceive it in the dark, yet, by Dr. Gregory, the late distinguished professor of chemistry in the University of Edinburgh, and many other gifted men, not only the proofs of its existence, but its absolute difference from all other dynamic agencies are considered as complete and convincing as any of the demonstrations in the elements of Euclid. Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" was a dead letter for 100 years, till Cobden and Bright rose to demonstrate to the nations the marvellous adaptation of its doctrines for the good of mankind. And so it may be with the discovery of "OD" by Baron Von Reichenbach, but we hope not. Neglected though his work is at present, a genius in God's good time will doubtless spring up, and show its bearings on science, and on an enlightened form of Therapeutics. In these papers we propose to open up in a succinct and simple form, and also to explain what this new "OD" force is, and point out its bearings, as manifested in society. These are thought by the unimpressionable to be mere fancies, peculiarities, or oddities in those who show them, in word, thought, or action.

In society there are to be found many persons who hate yellow, but nearly all love blue. These two colours are polar opposites. Many a maiden likes to look into a mirror and admire her own dear reflex, whilst others turn away, with a feeling of uneasiness, as if it breathed a hateful breath at them. Some people who travel in a railway carriage (however severe the weather) must have a window down, and are thought uncivil by requesting it; but, as we shall see further on, there is an innate feeling for it. Others swoon away in church, but are well at home. Some cannot sit at ease between two persons, but must sit alone. Others cannot eat from a spoon made of pewter, or Britannia, or German metal without nausea; or drink tea, or coffee, or chocolate boiled in brass vessels, without discomfort. Many persons dislike much-cooked victuals, fat, or sweets; but much prefer cold and slightly sour kinds of food. Some feel uneasy if you shake them by the hand; but to hold their hand in yours for a time would be perfect torture. Some people go to sleep at once on the right side; others can never go to sleep on the left. Now are these mere fancies, or the result of bad habits, or of defective education, or of disease? Scarcely; as some of these so-called "oddities" appear in groups in different individuals. For example: He who hates yellow, hates the looking-glass; he who loves to sit alone, opens the windows of the railway carriage; he who can sleep only on his right side, is unwell in the nave of the church. These oddities, or peculiarities, seem to have relationships amongst each other, and to arrange themselves in groups; and it will be seen, later on, that the cause lies deep, and is inherent in human nature.

Obtain a natural quartz crystal, and put it on the arm of a chair, the two ends being free. Let a sensitive hold his hand two inches from the pointed end, and he will feel a fine cool air; but, from the other, or blunt end, a warm air will feel to issue forth. Let this crystal be next taken into a place of deepest darkness; the sensitive will soon perceive the whole body pervaded with a mild light, and from the pointed end, a bluish flame, as long as a man's hand, will emanate; but from the blunt end, a yellow-red sort of a vapour will appear to be issuing. This delicate light can only be perceived by sensitives; and Reichenbach has tested it in every possible form, in thousands of cases. Being more refined and delicate in its manifestations, than colour, or light, or electricity, or magnetism, by Reichenbach it is named "OD" or the "Odic" force, and it is found in all bodies throughout the wide universe. It streams from our great day-star (the sun) with the common light and heat; but, it is neither of them. The pointed end of the crystal gave out a blue flame and a refreshing coolness; so, by experiment, do the blue rays of the sun. The blunt end of the crystal gave out yellow and red rays, and produced a lukewarm, disagreeable sensation; so do the yellow and red rays of the sun impart a similar sensation. Thus, it seems, that the colours, blue and yellow, have other powers besides making themselves sensitive on the retina of the eye; and there will be found something more than mere fancy—that scape-goat word for all forms of ignorance—to account for the varied "oddities" which attract notice in the different grades of society.

Take two similar glasses of water; let transmitted light fall on the one, and reflected light on the other. The water in the first glass, to a sensitive, will taste warm and bitterish; that, in the second glass, cool and sourish. No chemistry at present known, could detect such delicate differences.

From the moon "OD" streams down, and its effect on the poor sensitive is well known, and has been so, from time immemorial; hence, from the Latin luna, the moon, the word lunatic is derived, and the place of his confinement is termed a lunatic asylum. All lunatics are sensitives, either natural, or superinduced, in a greater or less degree of impressionability. Moonlight, being reflected light, a glass rod held in the left hand of a sensitive, in the moon's rays, will convey a lukewarm sensation; but when drawn into the shade, the sensation would be cool. The same experiment tried in sunshine would be the reverse; whilst held in sunshine, the rod would give a cool sensation, but when drawn into the shade a warm one. Take a copper wire, put one end in a dark chamber, and the other in sunshine; soon the end of the wire in the dark chamber streams with a flame as long as the finger, showing that sunlight had sent a stream of "OD" through the wire.

Reichenbach, the discoverer of creosote, paraffin, assamar, and other substances well known to the chemist, and "though last, not least," but greatest really, of this Odic force, took one of his sensitives, Miss Nowotny, into a chamber of the deepest darkness, to test if she could see anything. Unknown to her, a magnet had been placed. After some time, she said she saw a magnet with a blue flame streaming from the north end, and orange-coloured flames streaming from the south end. This light was collected into a focus, reflected upon the wall, by means of a burning glass, showing that it was material.

Professor Endlicher, who was a demi-sensitive, was put into the profoundest darkness. A cat, a butterfly, a bird and a plant in flower had been placed there without his knowledge. Having sat for two hours in this extreme darkness, the professor, in terrified astonishment, suddenly cried out, "I see a blue flower—a gloxiana"; so it was, a gloxiana speciosa; and, as nothing can be seen without light, the buds, pistils, anthers, flower-leaves, stalks, all were aglow, and even the leaves were dimly visible. He also saw the cat, the butterfly, and the bird, all glowing with this beautifully delicate Odic light. A man, in the dark chamber, appears, to sensitives, first like a rudely-formed snow man; then, like a warrior dressed in armour; and lastly, he looks like a fiery giant. The sensitive, looking on himself, seems all aglow; his hand presents the appearance of one held close before a candle in a dark room—longer than natural, and from every finger a flame-like extension seems to stream, the last joint and the finger-nails being the brightest. The human body is not only all aglow [with "OD," but the right hand and right foot, indeed the whole of the right side is of a bluish colour: the left hand and left foot, in fact, the whole of the left side is of a yellowish colour; the "OD" emanations from the body being precisely similar to those coming from the crystal, the magnet, and sunlight. It has been found, by experiment, that the Odic sensations of touch were different; the right, or blue hand, being put into the left, or yellow hand, of a sensitive, produced an agreeable, coolish feeling; but the left, or yellow hands, being joined, or even approximating, produced a disagreeable coolish sensation. This experiment was tried with more than a hundred sensitives, and always with the same result. Hence the reason, why some people dislike to shake hands; they are sensitives, and the act gives rise to an unpleasant feeling, and is therefore avoided. Perhaps this may be at the bottom of the habit of some persons giving the finger only; the less the surface in contact, the slighter the sensation of unpleasantness. It is also evident why some persons avoid crowds, as people before, or behind, offer resistance like poles, and thus give rise to a series of disagreeable sensations. For a similar reason some men cannot ride on horseback because the like sides of the rider come in contact with the like sides of the animal; the gentleman, in this case, is a born sensitive. For a similar reason some ladies cannot carry little children on their backs, not even for a few minutes in play, because like poles they are brought into contact; the ladies, too, are sensitives.

At a banquet, the guest to be honoured is placed at the right of the host. It will now be evident that there is a deep-seated cause in our Odic natures for this immemorial arrangement. He, on the right hand, gets the "OD" negative of the left, who, in his turn, receives the positive "OD" of him on the right. The one on the right gives as much pleasurable feeling as the one on the left loses, and vice versa. This custom of honouring a guest is not merely formal or traditional, but clearly springs from our inmost natures. There are thousands of cases in life, of which this will serve as the key and the explanation; and, consequently, it will be seen that the peculiar people called "oddities," are really natural sensitives, whose feelings should, at all times, and under all circumstances, be most scrupulously respected.

As to the operation of will and faith in magnetic cures, Mr. Cadwell, who gives lectures in the United States, writes in Facts: "A man came upon the platform at one of my lectures at Welles Hall, in 1873, among others who offered themselves as subjects for mesmeric experiments. I found him a good subject. He was evidently a chronic invalid. He got better of his illness and wrote out his case for me. His name, it appeared, was Augustus Dana, of 34, Broadway, Lowell, Mass.; his doctors had told him that he was consumptive and had heart disease; he was weak, thin, weighing only 124 pounds, and unable to work. Two of his acquaintances told him that I cured where I mesmerised. He knew nothing of mesmerism, but consented to their helping him to the Hall, and then up the platform-steps. After the experiments he walked home, slept well and naturally got so much better that in a few weeks he resumed his work. I have just (May, 1885) seen Mr. Dana; he is strong, rugged, and weighs 209 pounds. My will had been exercised, not to cure, but to use him as a subject for my mesmeric entertainment; and as to his faith, it was no more than acquiescing in the recommendation of his acquaintance."

VICTOR HUGO's friend, M. Besson, thus writes in the Revue Spirite: "The last time I saw Victor Hugo he said, 'If we see no more of each other in this world we shall meet in the next.' His wife and daughter, whom I met in London twenty years ago at Mrs. Milner Gibson's, were also Spiritualists. After the death of his two sons he wrote, 'While we wait, death comes; and they to whom he comes leave behind them mourners. But patience! One after another we all go. Death hath taken the young; but one day, perhaps soon, the sons will be followed by the father; he will lie as if asleep, he will be put within four boards and be borne to the sombre opening of the earth, the grave. What looks like a departure there is really an entrance. Then he will know what he had hitherto dimly believed; the eyes of the body closing, those of the spirit will open, the invisible become the visible; what to men is the world, will be to him eclipsed; while silence reigns around the grave, as the earth is thrown upon his coffin, the mysterious soul is passing from dimness to light; those who, to him, had disappeared, reappear; the truly living, who in the terrestrial shade are called the dead, present themselves in the radiance of a new vision, call lovingly to the new-comer, shedding their smiles upon his dazzled countenance! Thus goes the soul that hath well done its work, leaving here some regrets, followed by sorrowing faces, and perhaps some tears, but received into the realm of eternal brightness with joy, the garb of mourning exchanged for a robe of rejoicing. O my loved ones!'"

It is no disparagement to the experience described in this book to say that it cannot be estimated without reference to the new psychology which has grown from the study of somnambule conditions. In its most recent developments in Germany, that psychology is also a philosophy which fully recognises man's transcendental individuality. What for the philosophies of Schopenhauer and Hartmann is the "unconscious" source of somnambule illumination, has become with Du Prel and Hellenbach a subject, including, but far exceeding, the personal self-consciousness. The germ of this view in modern philosophy is to be found in Kant's suggestion that there may be two persons of one subject. But though independently arrived at in recent speculations, it is very similar to the account which Swedenborg gives of the two-fold consciousness of man as a spirit and as physically embodied. And it has very important consequences for the interpretation of all transcendently derived experience. For, as the normal Ego knows nothing of the transcendental subject, any entrance of the latter into its consciousness is as that of a stranger. There is, to use Du Prel's expression, a "self-sundering" at the threshold, when this is at all displaced to admit a transcendental content. In the deep dream, or somnambule consciousness, the transcendental subject steps forth as a second personality, the necessary form with which the dream-organ (wherever we place it physiologically) invests the new impression. Hence, the "guides" and "guardians" of somnambules and mediums. Moreover, we now know that the somnambule, or transcendental functions, though never mingling their consciousness with that of waking life, so that the latter could identify them with itself, can exist and act simultaneously with it. The dream-consciousness is in one, and by far the most important, respect more conversant with reality than that of sense, for it is a faculty in more intimate rapport with nature; but in another respect it is the source of an illusion to the lower consciousness which has to translate it into the terms of sense.

The personification of the Sympneuma may be such a translation of the transcendental consciousness of the indivisible biunity of man. But not on that account would it be an experience less significant of a genuine development of life. Nay, as a constant phenomenon it would be equally real with the whole investiture of sense. That also is the expression for us of a transcendental nature. That also would be an illusion for a degree or mode of consciousness which should otherwise mediate the forces impinging on it. In this sense of illusion it includes all objectification or manifestation: it is the Maya of the world.

That sense should represent according to its degree and mode every essential fact of the inner life would be a consequence of the conversion and purification of the sense consciousness from the exclusive attachment to externally derived objects, which comes from selfish passions and desires. This is usually described as a conversion from sense itself. But the "sub-surface" sensibility of which we hear so much in this book is to be regarded as the true ultimate of man, cased over, as it were, by the incrustations of a baser consciousness, an outgrowth of susceptibility to sub-human influences. This sub-surface sensibility is identifiable as the seat of the somnambule consciousness, a receptivity to transcendental impressions. Any disintegration of the coarser nerve enfoldment may partially reveal its activities, and thus it is that in the case of somnambules and mediums those activities are not ordinarily associated with any special moral elevation. But there cannot be a doubt that atrophy of the coarser sensibilities would result from their disuse, that is, from cessation of the desires they mediate and gratify. Biological evolution, by which the present sub-surface sensibility, with its finer rapports, would become the external degree of human consciousness, is thus an affair of moral evolution. Only thus could this subtle organism be protected from the infestation to which it is peculiarly exposed when its susceptibilities are quickened by abnormal conditions. Even under such conditions, as in the case of somnambulism induced by disease, it often mediates an exalted moral consciousness and intelligence, such as may not be apparent in the merely personal character. That is the emergence of the transcendental subject above the threshold, who then of course speaks as, and is inevitably accounted, a "guardian" or "control." On the other hand, the history of many mediums, whether they are recognised as such or not, sufficiently illustrates the danger of a premature and unprepared exposure of the finer organism. Every normal evolution, however, tends to the exposure of surfaces in due course of growth. Every differentiation of an organ has been such an exposure. Nature, or the divine operation which is nature from the subjective side, does everything for its products as soon as it can be done safely and securely. The power of a finer organism to maintain itself as the external body of man upon this earth would be dependent on the moral conditions from which physical conditions, representing them, originate. The hostile forces of an environment may be repelled either by a greater resistance of their own nature, or by the dominant energies of a superior nature. As long as the human individual is isolated, he cannot realise and wield the psychical forces which belong to essential humanity. But when the unity of the race is a living fact for every member of it, the vast reserves of force can be drawn to any point where they are needed, and the individual suit of armour can be discarded. Such a suit of armour, according to the conception of this book, is our present solid organism.

We have heard some complaints lately that telepathic psychology is being pressed too far. It is destined to be enormously extended. The human race is an inchoate organism, the internal rapproches of which are only as yet apparent between its more intimately associated members. The individual sympathies mediating thought and sensational transference are only an early and special case of the great human rapproch which will come to observation with every advance of the unitary consciousness. Once see that the development of wider and more real sympathies, the sense of a larger self, opens avenues of transmission for appeal and response, and it needs no prophetic instinct to foretell that telepathy will solve the problem of Socialism. And the science of telepathy is the biology of the future, for it will trace the evolution of a new organism, the organism of human solidarity. That those who are studying these phenomena with so much patience, caution, and scientific acumen would anxiously repudiate association with such speculations as these, and would themselves avoid all premature generalisation, I am of course aware. They would be perfectly right. But as a less responsible writer, I am concerned with applications closely suggested by a book which to many readers, I am afraid, must appear not less wild than anything I can say on my own account. Yet to me it seems that one of the most pregnant thoughts of our time is that which conceives even the provinces of physics and physiology as dependent on moral causes, and as modifiable by them. That, the principle of a spiritual energy pressing outwards and "making all things new" through human consciousness, is for me the essential message of "Symplemata." Nor is it necessary to have the faintest personal presentiment of the special form of that consciousness which is announced, in order to see that the relation between metaphysical principle and evolutionary process may well result in it.

Space and leisure fail for the consideration of further questions. It would have been better, perhaps, and more acceptable to the reader, had I let the book speak oftener, and upon more points, for itself. But my object has been less to review it as a whole than to assimilate and reproduce, as best I could, some of its conceptions, and more especially to obviate objections of an alleged materialistic tendency. It is, perhaps, inevitable that misconceptions should arise. The great theme of psychical evolution, in its analogous applications to the race and to the individual, is a field of speculation that has come under literary cultivation within the last few years. The manifold forms of this conception mark it as an epochal development of thought and experience. Its several exponents, preoccupied by distinctive forms and aspects of the idea, may be little disposed to recognise each other as colleagues, but the fact remains that all are training students whom the larger insight of the future may comprehend in a single school, or, at least, recognise as alike legitimate offspring of a single movement.

A BUDDHIST CATECHISM.—The Biogen Series. No. 3. By Colonel Olcott, edited and annotated by Professor Coues. Boston: Estes and Lauriat. May be ordered through the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W.

Colonel Olcott's Buddhist Catechism has been long known to us. It has had a wide Eastern circulation, 17,000 in Ceylon; 15,000 in Burmah; a French edition last year, a German and an American this year. Its agreement with the Canon of the Southern Buddhist Church is guaranteed by the certificate of the High Priest Sumangala, of Ceylon. It is, no doubt, a good and true presentation of doctrine which has more of interest for the Eastern than for Western peoples, but which cannot be without attraction for those who remember that this form of faith suffices the spiritual needs of some 450,000,000 of our common race: no less than for those students of comparative religion who have found in the teachings of the Buddha maxims of beauty and truth, and an example of a singularly self-denying and self-sacrificing life.

But there would have been no cause to direct attention again to a work already so widely circulated, were it not that this American edition is enriched by a number of suggestive notes and comments by the editor, Professor Coues. Some of the statements made in the Catechism have proved thought-provoking to him, and have caused him to make some criticisms, and to add some elucidatory notes which very largely increase the value of the book for Western readers; and which, I trust, may show to Eastern students also how, in some things, we differ from their opinions.

An instance will make my meaning clearer. At the opening of the Catechism we are told that Buddha was not a God; but "in form a man, though internally not like other men, i.e., in moral and mental qualities he excelled all other men of his own or subsequent times." On this the editor remarks, "Non-Buddhists, of course, may take exception to this statement, each in favour of his own system of religious belief or moral philosophy. But Christians can hardly do this with propriety since they have identified Jesus Christ with God, thus removing him from the category as beyond all comparison with other men. Yet it seems but right here to recognise the exalted and illustrious master of perfect wisdom, the gentle Nazarene, the very Christ and later brother-adept of Gautama, whose similar life and nearly identical teachings have so long illumined the Occident with the light of Divine truth, in spite of all that many of his nominal adherents have been able to effect to the contrary." This is a type of comment, vindicating in an undogmatic and unsectarian spirit, without any spice of theological bitterness, the claims which Christ's teaching, and his sinless life and example have on those who know them, for which many of us will cordially thank Dr. Coues.

The subject of psychical phenomena in all branches also receives considerable elucidation from a number of able notes explanatory of the text, or intended to supply omissions or to correct statements made in it. The question of re-birth, for example, gives opportunity for an interesting statement of the beliefs of French Spiritists, and American and English Spiritualists on the subject. The law of Karma finds clear statement, and the parallel line of thought in Western Spiritualism is brought out. We have various instructive discussions on misused words, such as soul and spirit, individuality and personality; and some serious attempt to elucidate the meaning of such purely Eastern terms as Nirvana, Devachan, Kama-loca, &c. It is the more interesting to Spiritualists to find the points in which their experiences and beliefs impinge on Eastern thought thus vindicated and emphasised, because Professor Coues makes it very abundantly clear that he has no sympathy with that crude and gross, not to say vulgar and repulsive form, of what is generically known as Spiritualism, which, in his own country and elsewhere, has done so much to bring contempt on the whole subject.

There are, further, some notes on Apparitions (p. 16); on Atheism,* as shown in Buddhist teaching (p. 55); on Idolatry (p. 58); on Ascetic Development (pp. 21-64), and on kindred subjects, which tempt me to say that a text so annotated is of more suggestive value than an elaborate dissertation of an independent character might have been.

"M. A. (Oxon.)"

"Atheism?" exclaims Dr. Coues, after discussing the meaning of the phrase "Buddhists cannot conceive of a Creator." "Atheism? Theism? Monotheism? Polytheism? Pantheism? O ye of little faith, anthropomorphic theists one and all, crouching beneath a gigantic shadow thrown upon the void of space, know that there are as many Gods—no more, no fewer—as there are human beings who have ever conceived an idea of Deity."

The "Electric Girl" at the Albert Palace.

SIR,—Can any of your readers give any explanation of the extraordinary phenomenon at the Albert Palace, "the Electric Girl"? I saw her accidentally, and she interested me exceedingly.

I took hold of her hand, and the electric shock was violent and unmistakable. Also, when I put my finger in the glass of water in which she placed hers, the shock was almost stronger. All of the party who were having an audience at the same time felt exactly the same. Strangely enough, there was one gentleman who felt nothing, neither from her hand nor from the glass of water, and he was stupid enough to turn round and say to us, "I feel nothing, you must all have fancied it." What can be the rationale of the physical and psychical condition of such a woman? She is short and stout, very strongly built. She looks of an excitable and eager temperament, and decidedly intelligent; but her life must be a burden to her, if her electric touch makes every one shrink and start.

In old times what a wonderful magician she could have been—a very goddess Electra.—Faithfully yours,

Astrological Predictions.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Without laying undue stress on the following cases, I think they should be noted. In Raphael's Almanac for the present year (published last autumn), I find for July: "Saturn on the cusp of the 12th in square to Uranus shows that . . . much secret crime will be brought to light." The coincidence of the revolting disclosures in the Pall Mall Gazette is striking.

For the 6th of August (conjunction of Saturn and Mars) both Zadkiel and Raphael predict "storms and floods," which were in fact reported in the newspapers of the following day from various parts.

The "Unconscious Secondary Self."
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Being deeply interested in the subject of "automatic writing," I was glad to see in last week's number of "LIGHT," Mr. Henry Kiddle's criticism of the article by Mr. F. W. H. Myers, attributing writing of this kind to the agency of some "unconscious or secondary self" rather than to the external agency to which it is mainly attributed by Spiritualists. We must all of us find life a sufficiently difficult matter when responsible only for the doings of the one "self," with which we are tolerably well acquainted; but what will become of us if we should find ourselves suddenly confronted with a "second self," of whose very existence we had previously been in total and happy ignorance?

Mr. Kiddle argues against one instance given by Mr. Myers of the presence of this "unconscious and secondary self," because it was able to write a rather "complex anagram"; but here at least the conscious performer in this curious partnership of "selves" (the one who had his hand upon the planchette), could have done quite as well as his "unconscious," and generally sleeping partner, and could have made as good an anagram. But how will those who hold this perplexing theory explain it, when what is done by the "unconscious" self transcends altogether any power possessed by the conscious or original self? As a case in point, I need not go beyond myself—or myself, as I suppose Mr. Myers would say, though at present it sounds curious. My hand both writes and draws automatically, by which of course I mean that I hold, but do not myself move, either pen or pencil; and both the drawing and the writing done in this automatic way are altogether impossible to the only "self" of which I have any knowledge, or in which I have any belief! Most of my drawings are wild and beautiful, and as mysterious almost as the power by which they are produced; but they are altogether unmeaning, and, therefore, have ceased to interest me; but the writing (absolutely automatic, or I should not trouble to be writing this) professes in every instance to be the writing of departed friends, and in every instance appears the exact handwriting of the friend professing to write; and as I know that it would be just as impossible for my "conscious" self to take up a violin and play like Joachim as it would be to take up a pen and write like any friend I have, either on earth or in Heaven, which of the two explanations of these marvellous handwritings am I likely to accept? The natural one they invariably give of themselves. Am I, however, to accept, in face of this, the unnatural and extremely painful one that, all this time—all unsuspected by my one true self—there has been some second self, with powers in one respect far surpassing my own, and which is now for the first time exercising those powers for the sole purpose of deceiving me and mocking me with a baseless hope—the hope that those are living whom I had mourned as dead, and are even able to speak to me again, able to use once more the hand that was always so ready in their service, and to tell me by it of their perfect happiness and of their undying love!

But indeed Mr. Myers, further on in his article, makes special reference to cases in which "the handwriting of the dead is said to have been reproduced," almost admitting as it seemed to me at the time I read it, that if this could be proved, his theory would be incapable of explaining the fact. I am sorry I cannot quote exactly, having lent the number of the Proceedings in which the article appeared, but the sense of what was written I can promise to give correctly. "Handwriting," Mr. Myers wrote, "is a deep-seated thing and may possibly have secrets to tell us." So far I believe, I am exact even to the words which impressed me so much, because I had found them so true; for the handwritings of which I have spoke have indeed had "secrets" to tell me, and as for a handwriting being "a deep-seated thing," so much does it seem to me a part of ourselves, that it would surprise me as little for a friend to be able to speak in the exact and peculiar tones of my voice, as to write my exact and rather peculiar handwriting! What long practice might enable us to do, we may surely leave out of the question, since, except for the purpose of committing forgery, who could practise anything of the kind? but having alluded to this, I will just say, that I never, in any of the handwritings my hand writes automatically and so perfectly, copied of one of them one single stroke.

Mr. Myers says that to meet such cases as these "reproduced" handwritings, his theory might require some modification, but what I more than believe (and hope) is, that if some day Mr. Myers should publish a third article upon "automatic writing," he will not modify or alter in any way his theory, but that he will abandon it altogether; that a deeper study of the subject will convince him that the existence of an "unconscious or secondary self," endowed with powers often quite different, and sometimes much greater, than are the powers of the visible or real self, must be as imaginary and unreal as it would certainly be troublesome and perplexing.—I am, sir, yours, &c.

A LADY residing in the neighbourhood of Regent's Park, desires to join a private circle. Address M. B., care of the Editor of "LIGHT."

MRS. CORA L. V. RICHMOND'S APPOINTMENTS.—Nottingham, August 9th to 22nd; Halifax, 23rd and 24th; Batley Carr, 27th; Leeds, 30th, and either 25th or 28th; also September 1st; Burnley, 6th; Newcastle, 13th; Assembly Rooms, Kensington, 20th.

CAVENDISH ROOMS.—On Sunday last, August 9th, W. J. Colville addressed large audiences in Cavendish Rooms. On Sunday next, August 16th, Mr. Macdonald will be the speaker. On Sunday, August 23rd, W. J. Colville will again conduct the services, and deliver two lectures, that being his last Sunday in London for the present season. Services commence regularly at 11 a.m. and 7 p.m. All seats are free and expenses are met solely by voluntary contributions. W. J. Colville's last public reception will be held at 16, York-street, on Tuesday, August 25th, at 3 p.m. W. J. Colville's provincial engagements are as follows: Belper, August 30th and 31st and September 1st; Potteries, Staffordshire, September 3rd and 4th; Leeds, September 6th, 7th, and 8th; Barrow-in-Furness, September 9th and 10th; Manchester, September 13th; Sheffield, September 14th, 15th, and 16th; Pendleton (Town Hall), September 20th. W. J. Colville has only a very few evenings at his disposal. Those who desire his services are requested to make immediate application. Address till August 21st, 28, Rue Washington, Paris; after that date, 16, York-street, Portman-square, London, W.

THE LAWS OF NATURE.

Man's conceptions of the laws of nature have always been visibly modified by every marked increase of his knowledge, and the supposed improbabilities of one age have often become the acknowledged actualities of the next.

The laws of nature are to us what we know of nature, but as our knowledge changes daily, so do our conceptions of nature's laws. The modifications may be slight, but they are certain and constant, and, at not very long intervals, discoveries are made which of necessity enforce a recasting of our supposed knowledge of cosmic laws. A few centuries ago the existence of Antipodean inhabitants was thought impossible, and said to be contrary to the laws of nature, and now there are few of us who are not walking feet to feet with our own offspring.

The duty of a student of nature is not to circumscribe her infinite resources, but to attempt to discover them; not to affirm à priori what can, and what cannot be, but to discover what is.

We may dream and speculate respecting the mysteries of the universe, but at no point can we say to the human mind "Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther." Here shall thy proud inquiries cease. Our knowledge of nature and its laws is manifestly imperfect and incomplete, and it were the height of folly to assume that finite minds had reached, or could reach, the solution of the infinite enigma. Let facts speak, however opposed to our preconceptions, and let our only care be that they are facts and not phantasies; realities and not illusions.

Our knowledge of nature is almost purely empirical, and apart from experiment it is next to impossible for the most sagacious human mind to predicate results with certainty. It is true that there are cases in which shrewd inferences have anticipated experiment, but experiment, and experiment alone, affords a certain foundation for reliable knowledge.

The inferences we draw beyond the range of experiment are at best but tentative hypotheses in explanation of occult phenomena.

Take for example the phenomena of light and vision, to explain which men have invented a hypothetical luminiferous ether, which is supposed most satisfactorily to explain them, and yet the explanation, which rests on theoretical mathematics, is only believable in the absence of a more satisfactory hypothesis.

Men of science require working hypotheses, and in a hypothetical ether they have a means of more or less satisfactorily accounting for the incomprehensible phenomena of light and vision. No theories of vision fully explain the facts, they merely take a few early problematical steps towards their solution.

Light, heat, gravity, and magnetism are supposed to be intimately correlated, and yet there are only few substances which light, subtle as it is, can penetrate, and all substances are pervious to gravity and magnetism; they are forces which no known substance can resist.

It were the height of folly, therefore, to assume that we have reached the boundaries (if they have any) of nature's laws. The laws which rule nature may be, like nature itself, infinite, but whether infinite or not, they are practically infinite to our finite capacities, and when we find that their sphere has been in a constant condition of unceasing flux in all the past, it is illogical to affirm that progress has now ceased, and that all alleged discoveries must absolutely coincide with what we are now supposed to know, and cannot go beyond, or in apparent opposition to, our present knowledge.

We are in reality only groping tentatively among the infinite laws of the Almighty; we see nature as yet through a glass darkly, and the truly clairvoyant vision of nature which mankind may hope to reach, is yet in the far future, a future which will be the more speedily reached by the leaders of science modestly feeling their own ignorance, and honestly testing every alleged new fact vouched for by credible and capable witnesses.

To demand of discoverers of new forces a clear explanation of the fundamental laws of the forces, prior to investigation, is unreasonable, inasmuch as all the recognised primary forces are as yet inexplicable; gravitation, light, heat, magnetism, actinism, atomic affinity, life, sensation, thought, known almost from the infancy of the race, are each and all inexplicable, and yet all are accepted as facts.

Moral courage is the great want of the world. Let scientific and learned men dare to look for truth in all directions, and dare honestly to proclaim the results of their investigations, and the despised and feared phenomena of Modern Spiritualism will presently be triumphant over a deeply prejudiced and blindly conservative world.

A RESIDENT at Weston-super-Mare desires to meet with other persons interested in Spiritualism with a view to forming a circle for investigation. Apply K. P., care of Editor of "LIGHT."

OTHER TIMES OTHER WAYS.—In former times medicine was a priestly function; but in latter days it has become a business. Sick people are valued by the income they bring to the doctor. Medical practices are sold like tradesmen's custom or good-will. Modern French law, however, does not sanction this part of medical practice. The Court of Cassation has just decided that the heirs of a physician cannot sell the practice which he had, on the ground that it was not an office transmissible at the option of the holder.—Journal du Magnétisme.

HUMAN MAGNETISM.—At Nantes my friend Madame Rivière, a good typological medium, has a neighbour, a poor lady, with a daughter aged fifteen, pronounced consumptive, who had kept her bed, pale and thin, for two months, unable to hold up her head. Madame Rivière had heard it said that magnetic passes by a healthy person relieved the sick, and sometimes cured, and she offered to try the effect of her magnetising upon her. At her first sitting of a quarter of an hour, the patient's head was much relieved. At the end of three days, being magnetised twice a day, she went into calm sleep in five minutes. In four weeks, only being magnetised, and taking no medicine, the girl eats with good appetite, and goes out for daily walks. Madame Rivière perseveres, looking forward to a complete restoration. She has had no instructions in magnetising, but being actuated by goodwill, believes that she is aided by good spirits.—Revue Spirite.

TRANSCERENCE OF IDEAS NOT THROUGH THE SENSES.

My brother Franz, like myself—says Bernard Ragazzi, in his Journal du Magnétisme,—was an enthusiast in the field of experimentation. One of his subjects was Anne N., whom he magnetised for a constitutional complaint of the chest, with excellent effect. During his treatment of her case some striking phenomena presented themselves, proving the transference of ideas from him to her not through the channels of the senses. Here are a few of his experiments:—

On his inducing the magnetic sleep, he held towards her silently an imagined vase of roses. She leant towards his hand and said admiringly, and as if inhaling the perfume, "What lovely roses!" In his surprise at the success of his experiment he dropped his hand, when she stretched out hers as if to catch the imagined vase; then he mentally effaced the image he had formed.

On another occasion he imagined himself to be headless. She exhibited so much dismay that he lost no time in mentally restoring the head to his image.

On another, as he was about presenting himself to her, he imagined himself to be me, his brother Bernard. She greeted him by my name, and in accordance with the idea that he was I.

My brother had the direction of an amateur theatrical company, of which Anne was a member. On the evening of a last rehearsal, Anne did not appear, and as her part was an important one, my brother went to her house, not far, to remind her. She had a cold, and thought she had better not expose herself to the bleak east wind; it was in February. In his desire for the success of the piece, my brother ventured to make a further experiment of acting upon her mind. He imagined the weather to be fine, and said, "You can come very well, the weather has turned fine." She expressed her satisfaction, and accompanied him at once. On meeting her friends she congratulated them upon the favourable change of the weather. They were surprised, and began to dispute with her about it, when my brother drew attention to the business in hand. Anne took no harm by her walk through the wind, really from the east.

If the ideas conveyed to her mind in the somnambulant state were not effaced by her magnetiser, they remained with her when she returned to the normal. There was nothing in her appearance, in the somnambulant state, indicating to a third person that she was in that state. Her magnetiser knew when she passed into it from a slight convulsive movement of her face.

I witnessed, for myself, these and similar phenomena through the same sensitive subject; for my brother's affairs calling him abroad, Anne asked me to include her among my patients, for a return of her cough in consequence of a cold.

During her treatment, which was progressing well, I was one day called upon to make a journey; but, not to interrupt Anne's treatment, at the usual time for her, I secluded myself, and magnetised her from where I was at some miles distance. On my return in the evening I visited Anne, and found that she had felt the magnetisation at noon, and complained that it had left her rather agitated. I had acted too strongly. In magnetising at a distance it should be remembered that the force we use is not diminished by distance. Anne got well.

Some days having passed beyond the time for my brother's return, I feared that an accident had befallen him, and resolved to seek information of him through Anne's clairvoyance; but circumstances prevented me from visiting her for two days: then I went. On my entering she said, "Why have you not been before? I have been expecting you for two days." I said, "I have come for you to do me a kindness." She interrupted me with "Your brother is at Samaden; he has had headache there, but is now quite well; don't be uneasy about him, he will be here to-morrow." Next day he arrived; his account confirmed her perception as to where he was, how he was and had been, and as to his intention to reach home at a certain time.

It will be seen from this that even in her normal state, Anne had the faculty of seeing at a distance, and through physical obstacles. The records of somnambulant clairvoyance abound in instances of such clear perception, but subjects presenting the faculty in the conscious unmagnetised state are very rare. This is the only one I have met with during my long career; hence, I have recorded it. Such cases present to thinkers a vast field for reflection.

In listening to discussions upon our subject, one is sure to hear the word "imagination" frequently used. What they who use it really mean I never knew. But do not such cases as I have related point to its true significance? We see in them that things imagined by one individual can exist as real objective things to another.

It is astonishing that men of science should neglect such interesting studies—studies which would throw a flood of light into the minds of physicians, priests, and philosophers.

ABNORMAL FEELINGS.

Herr Jankowski communicates to Psychische Studien the further results of an experience which, in his case, has been combined with a rare power of self-observation and analysis. He will not allow the term "deceptions of sense," mere feeling never deceiving nor admitting of doubt, and being, "from the standpoint of cognition, pure intuition." And "all pure intuition is absolutely free from doubt and error." It is mental addition and attribution to the pure feeling that deceives. Herr Jankowski even declares from his own experience that there is no deception even by the sense-images in hallucination, if the understanding governs them. But whether he means that the understanding can detect the subjective character of the images, or only not believe in their objective character (as was the case with Nicolai), does not clearly appear. But the most interesting feature in the article is the account of abnormal feelings which he thinks underlie many beliefs, superstitious, mystical, and even philosophical. He seems to have experienced them all, and very graphically describes them. There is the abnormal sense (1) of space, the external consciousness of things undergoing no change, but the individual seeming to himself spatially elevated or depressed to infinite degrees; (2) of time, when we feel very aged, as though we had lived often in past ages of the world—an experience naturally suggestive of the Re-incarnation doctrine, which, however, Herr Jankowski rejects on account of the contradictions which these impressions reveal. (3) The feeling of eternity, in which all that is thought and seen is felt as eternal. From this feeling he thinks the doctrines of Pantheism and necessity may be derived. (4) The sense of dream. "One goes for a walk, and suddenly the world about us seems not at all there, as though all were a dream, but one is not disturbed, as there is no negation of the minds of men." He conceives that idealism may thus originate. (5) The feeling that beyond oneself is nothing—a terrible Egoism. (6) The abnormal sense of the fabulous. All objects are transfigured, as if some fable about them had come to life. It is very transitory. (7) The abnormal feeling of the mystical. These impressions, which are grotesque and often changing perversions of the historical, seem to be mis-named. (8) The feeling that everything is clay; this is connected with metaphysical materialism. (9) The abnormal feeling of animal life (the world is a great poultry-yard!) (10) The mysterious and exalted feeling of Revelation. The thoughts now take on the garb of revealed truths, and the force of this feeling impels to humble recognition of this character. (11) The abnormal feeling of the Divine, which the writer does not further describe. In conclusion he maintains his very strange and questionable proposition that great systems of religion and philosophy have thus originated, adding that "In these abnormal feelings we find a basis of explanation of the character of Moses, Jesus, and Mahomet, as also of Cagliostro, St. Germain, and others. Deceivers they were not."

ON THE MAGNETIC FLUID.

By DR. CHARPIGNON, in the Journal du Magnétisme.

The Journal du Magnétisme of March and April contains a communication from Victor Meunier detailing experiments recently made in London, and reported in the Philosophical Magazine, by some English men of science, who have repeated and verified some of those by the distinguished Reichenbach, by which he demonstrated that about one in ten of those experimented upon perceived, when in perfect darkness, a luminosity about the head and hands of certain individuals, as they did about electrified bodies, about magnets, particularly at their poles, and about other bodies, notably metals.

The relation of these experiments calls to mind my own in 1839, which I instituted to establish the existence of the human magnetic fluid and its filiation with the other imponderable agents in Nature, all emanating from one source. My experiments were published in my "Physiologie du Magnétisme," in 1841, and in a second edition in 1848; also in my "Etudes Physiques sur le Magnétisme" in 1844.

It is well to re-state such experiments now, when hypnotists and others are loud in vociferating that the human magnetic fluid is only to be ranked with some of the obsolete hypothetical conceptions of the Middle Ages. In my "Physiologie du Magnétisme" (chapter I.), I wrote: "When magnetised somnambules, apart from each other, have magnets placed before them they say they see around the metal a fine vapour, like that from my hand in magnetising; they see it accumulated at both poles of the magnet; but less abundant and less bright at one than at the other. A pair of pincers being held horizontally before them, they say they see a light luminous vapour along them; but when held vertically, in the direction of the magnetic meridian, they declare the difference to be remarkable, that the pincers seem then to be charged with the fluid. One somnambule, led by the similar appearance of the fluid from the magnet to my own, asked me to magnetise her knitting-needle. I did not succeed, but she still said that she saw it could be done." On this point I will quote what Dr. Despinès, of Aix, wrote to me in 1841: "I have witnessed the spontaneous magnetization of various small tools used by Madame Baud, the cataleptic patient of whom I wrote in my 'Observations de Médecine Pratique,' p. 234. She was employed in a watch manufactory; various small tools which, handled by her during the days immediately preceding one of her cataleptic attacks, became so magnetic that they attracted the little steel pins, screws, and filings, on her work-bench, to her great annoyance and that of her employer."

I could furnish further corroboration, but enough; my experiments have been confirmed by those of Despinès and of Burg, in his "Métallotherapie," as well as by those of Reichenbach, verified by men of science in London.

The phenomena of hypnotism, fascination, &c., do not invalidate experiments demonstrating the acting reality of the human magnetic fluid; the former show perturbation of the normal state, disturbances of the equilibrium of the cerebral functions, easily effected in some individuals by sudden impressions upon the senses, by fixed gazing, concentrating the attention, by any cause, in fact, diverting nervous force from certain cerebral foci to accumulate it upon others.

We hope Psychical Researchers will make a note of the following, from the Banner of Light. Professor Cadwell states that on one occasion he described past persons, places, and occurrences to a lady, of which she had not thought for years; but when she questioned him about what she was then thinking strongly he perceived nothing, that is, he had no impression from thoughts then present in her mind, but he had of thoughts of which she had no present memory.—Harbinger of Light.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XL.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

The Rev. Charles Voysey, who preaches every Sunday to a congregation of enlightened Theists, has printed a sermon on Spiritualism. Mr. Voysey admits that there are phenomena which need explanation, and are, therefore, worthy of investigation; but he fears that we are too credulous. Accepting the first Article of the Apostles' Creed—possibly the last—he rejects what lies between. When a clergyman of the Established Church has the courage to declare his unbelief as well as his belief, and take the consequences, I think he might go one little step further, and examine Spiritualism before denouncing it in a published sermon.

The first thing to be settled in regard to any question of fact is its truth. When that is decided, the nature, causes, and effects may be examined. If the asserted facts of Spiritualism are true, there can be no question of their importance. They change the whole aspect of the world, and the destiny of all humanity. No truth can be so important to man as one that gives convincing proof of continued existence.

Word and Work still writes about "The Mind Cure Craze." It insists that human credulity has no limit, only people are more inclined to "the romances of a morbid superstition" than "to accept the story of Divine love, though its evidence is overwhelming." It then goes on to say: "Hundreds claim to have been benefited in varying degree by mind-cure treatments. Many such become themselves healers, and thus the new idea has spread. Just now the religious features of the new departure more prominently engross public attention, and clergymen of all denominations are seriously considering how to deal with what they regard as the most dangerous innovation that has threatened the Christian Church in this region (Boston) for many years. Scores of the most valued Church members are joining the Christian Scientist branch of the metaphysical organisation, and it has thus far been impossible to check the defection. It is a movement far-reaching in its influences and including many thousands among its sympathisers whose ordinary good intelligence entitles their judgment to respect."

And what is the "Mind Cure"? One of its apostles says: "Reason in your mind that God made everything good. He is not the author of disease. Therefore, as disease is not a creation, it has no existence, but it is merely a delusion of the mind, the effect of fear. Fear is faith inverted and perverted. You are to gain the confidence of your patient; make him tell you the cause of what he thinks is his disease. But with your clearer mind you see that it is not sickness at all. You attain the power of healing by dwelling mentally upon the truth and wisdom of God, and then the faith of the healer meeting the fear of the patient produces a chemical change in the fluids of the system which results in health."

Anyone who has seen an exhibition of the influence of one strong will over others in exhibitions of what is rather absurdly called "Electro-biology," in which one mind controls the minds and bodies of a dozen passive subjects, can see how such a power might be, and often unconsciously is, used for cure. In thousands of cases the physician strengthens and cures his patients, whatever may be his medicine; and the man who swallowed the prescription, instead of taking it to the chemist, probably got the best of it.

The laying on of hands, the anointing with oil, the fervent and effectual prayers, are all modes of exercising the same gift of healing which medical diplomas cannot confer. When the "seventh son of a seventh son" was selected as a healer, a constant influence from all around him tended to make him one.

So mind acts on mind—the teacher, the preacher, is made strong, gifted, and eloquent by the magnetism of pupils and congregations. The supply follows the demand. A sensitive, sympathetic speaker receives, combines, and distributes the feelings and thoughts of those who listen—influenced, doubtless in many cases, by groups of spirits who find unconscious mediums for their teachings. And just in proportion as our pulpits are free, and our preachers are not tied up in theological systems, will there be genuine inspiration.

Christ told His Apostles not even to consider what they were to say. St. Paul wrote epistles, but not his sermons. No doubt a written sermon may be inspired, but an extemporaneous one may be helped by the congregation present.

A Rev. Dr. Gordon is denouncing the mind-cure craze of Boston, regarding "the whole system as a sort of witches' cauldron, in which every conceivable heathen and Christian heresy is seething and simmering to produce the subtle essence called 'mental medicine.'" Then, as "hundreds of young ladies especially are drawn into the system under the impression that they are getting some finer quality of Christianity," Dr. Gordon predicts very sad consequences to morality.

A friend sends me a slip cut from the News of the World, containing a story entitled "The D— in Dunchester," copied from The Argosy. It is one of many straws which show which way the wind blows. Even ten years ago no magazine editor would have accepted a story so supernatural. Now we have them everywhere—one of the many signs that we have entered upon a new era which no one in the early part of the nineteenth century would have considered possible. Fifty years ago the world seemed utterly materialistic. Now the tendency is quite in the opposite direction.

A friend kindly sends me two extracts from Lord Malmesbury's Memoirs. In one he speaks of a spectral illusion which constantly appeared to Lord Eglington; the other refers to the late Emperor Napoleon III.: "After dinner we smoked together, and the conversation fell upon pictures, about which the Emperor (Napoleon) professed complete ignorance. We then got upon Home and Spiritualism, which I saw he half believed in, and as he spoke of the many doubtful pictures in the house I suggested that it was desirable that Mr. Home should call up Titian's spirit and ask him whether he really painted the portrait of Francis I. which is in the gallery. Morny and Pietri took advantage of this to laugh at his belief, upon which he looked displeased, saying that if we could explain all we believed our religion would be a very easy task." (p. 563.)

The late Emperors of France and Russia were thoroughly convinced Spiritualists, because they were open-minded, careful, painstaking investigators. Napoleon III. had frequent sances with Home, the Brothers Davenport, and other mediums. The Czar Alexander had sances with Home, and manifested his personal friendship for him by becoming godfather to his son, and giving him his education. What is known to one Royal Family is likely to become known to others. Some Presidents of the United States have been pronounced Spiritualists—notably President Lincoln.

Clergymen of nearly all denominations may be expected to oppose Spiritualism from jealousy or fear. The Church of Rome claims an immense number of manifestations and all sorts of miracles. The lives of the saints abound with them. How natural to claim a monopoly! On the other hand, Protestantism has taught, in opposition to Rome, that all miracles ceased with the Apostles—and does not like to be contradicted by present facts. Here we are, then, between two fires.

Then come the men of culture who tell us, with Matthew Arnold, that miracles do not happen—only we happen to know that what are called miracles do happen every day. And the men of science tell us that our spiritual manifestations are contrary to the "well-known laws of nature"—so well-known that nobody has ever explained them, or even told us what they are. Why then all this fuss and nonsense about facts that any one may observe and be perfectly satisfied as to their reality?

Happily, no amount of scolding or swearing, preaching or praying, can change or do away with any fact, or prevent any genuine manifestation. Light has come into the world, and whoever may love darkness better than light, there is the light for those who seek and love it.

"Knaves or fools," you say. Well, which was Professor Hare, of Philadelphia; which was Professor Zollner, of Leipzig; Professor—but turn to the list of eminent men published in every number of "LIGHT." Were they, or are they, all knaves or fools? It comes to that; why shirk the question? As Spiritualists we do not say here is something which happened 6,000 years ago—if you don't believe it you are safe to be damned and "perish everlastingly." No; quite the contrary. We say, here are facts occurring every day all around you, for which there are thousands of living witnesses. If you will examine for yourself you will be convinced that you will live on after physical death.

It is not a question of what happened to Moses or Paul two or three thousand years ago, nor what is believed to-day by the Pope or the Archbishop of Canterbury. The question is as to the reality of phenomena of present daily occurrence in hundreds of places, in both hemispheres, witnessed and attested by as honest and intelligent men and women as live upon our planet.

Here it is in brief. When you say that Spiritualism is imposture and delusion, you say, in effect: Myriads of people, apparently as honest and intelligent as the general populations of the most enlightened countries, are deluders or deluded—knaves or fools—persons whose testimony is of no value as to present facts, occurring from day to day under their own observation.

Of course, upon the common theory that all mediums are impostors, and all manifestations frauds, every pretended medium must be the basest, lowest, vilest of humbugs, and all Spiritualists are either knaves or fools. Now it is estimated that there are 7,000,000 of Spiritualists in what we call Christendom—all of whom are knaves, humbugs, and impostors—excepting those who happen to be fools—credulous idiots, who, for thirty years, say, can be constantly cheated and defrauded, and whose testimony cannot be believed as to the most simple facts under their personal observation!

Victor Hugo was a thorough Spiritualist. He wrote:—

"As I approach my earthly end,
Much plainer can I hear afar
Immortal symphonies, which blend
To welcome me from star to star.
The tomb is not an endless night;
It is a thoroughfare—a way
That closes in a soft twilight,
And opens in eternal day."

In "Les Contemplations" he says: "I feel that previous to my existence on this earth I have already enjoyed my being."

"Say not to die; say, rather, to be born."

In "Les Misérables" he says: "God can add nothing to the happiness of those who love each other but to give them the endless duration of their love."

And more vigorously, more beautifully, if possible, he says in the poem above quoted:—

"As I approach my earthly end,
Much plainer can I hear afar
Immortal symphonies, which blend
To welcome me from star to star.
Though marvellous, it still is plain;
A fairy tale, yet history;
Losing earth, a Heaven we gain;
With death, win immortality."

For fifty years my willing pen,
In history, drama, and romance,
With satire, sonnets, or with men,
Has flown or danced its busy dance.
All themes I tried: and yet I know
Ten thousand times as much unsaid
Remains in me! It must be so,
Though ages should not find me dead.

When unto dust we turn once more,
We can say, 'One day's work is done';
We may not say, 'Our work is o'er,'
For life will scarcely have begun."

All poets, indeed, are Spiritualists, at least on their poetical side. A poet may, indeed, by a sort of mental duality, imagine himself an Agnostic, but on the poetical side he is immortal.

ON MAGNETIC SOMNAMBULISM.

(From the Journal du Magnétisme.)

M. Richet, an eminent physiologist, informs the readers of his Revue Scientifique that he has witnessed somnambulism. His acquaintance with human magnetism is only superficial. He says: "Mesmer did not create animal magnetism; and if Puységur had not taken it up after him we might have heard little more about him." Magnetism belongs to human nature, and the knowledge of it goes back to remote antiquity; but it is to Mesmer and his successors that we owe our present knowledge of it. He was the first to promulgate it to the world, and he laid the foundations of a new therapy, the value of which is yet to be appreciated by savants, whose tendency to abase him in public esteem has always seemed to me as mean as it is unjustifiable. But justice will be done to him by posterity.

M. Richet erroneously confounds magnetism with induced somnambulism, which is only one of its effects. Here is another of his errors: he says, "If after a few séances there are no results the subject may be regarded as an unyielding one", whereas practice teaches us that the somnambule sleep comes on sometimes only after weeks, and even in rare cases, even months of treatment.

Then he says that "mental travelling is only a kind of somnambule reverie without any relation to objective facts." Mental travelling is a reality too well established to be disposed of by a wave of M. Richet's hand.

He says, "One of the most interesting phenomena of somnambulism was brought under notice some thirty years ago, by an Englishman named Braid. He demonstrated that if the limbs of a subject in somnambulism are put into a certain position, that position induces (in the subject) sentiments in conformity. Thus, if the arm be pulled straight and the fingers doubled into a fist, his face assumes an expression of anger; if the palms are joined, he falls upon his knees as if in prayer," &c.

Further study of somnambule phenomena would show M. Richet that such changes of expression are determined, not by mechanically placing the subject's limbs in this or that position, but by the magnetiser's thought. I have repeatedly produced such effects by my will alone, without any outer manifestation of it. I therefore conclude that the determining cause in the phenomenon is mind acting upon mind. I am ready to demonstrate this truth.

Of somnambule lucidity M. Richet says:—"Magnetisers declare that the intelligence of somnambules can draw aside the veil of the future, penetrate the mysteries of the distant present and the remote future; that they can be mentally present at conversations going on at the other side of the world; and magnetisers call this faculty 'lucidity'; but we have to dispose of such fables," &c.

Against such a flippantly expressed opinion we set the testimony of men who have studied the subject, men of eminence, that the facts thus derided are real and not to be disposed of so summarily by M. Richet. I could fill a volume with such testimony, but content myself here with quoting that of Lavater, whose truthfulness and intelligence none will call in question. He wrote in German, so his testimony will be new to many of my readers. Writing to his friend Campé, Lavater says:—

"I fear you will feel some uneasiness on my account when you hear that I have magnetised my wife.

"Nobody could have been more prejudiced against Mesmer than myself, but being assured by three persons, for whom I entertain great respect, that I might be able to cure her, I consulted her physician; he did not discourage me, so I set to work, and the result surpassed all expectation.

"What will our philosophers say when they are told that three physicians, in whose presence I magnetised her, are ready to testify that she exhibited the faculty of divination? Everything she saw and predicted has come to pass. Well, let the philosophers laugh or weep, my friend Campé will, I am sure, rejoice at my having succeeded, by the simplest although most inexplicable means, in restoring to health the most amiable of women.

"Grant me, my dear freethinker, the freedom to see things as I see them, until you can show me that I am under a delusion."

This frank and concise affirmation on the part of a great man ought to have weight with those who doubt the higher faculties exhibited by magnetic somnambules.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

G. B. FINCH.—Will appear next week.

M. B.—The books were despatched as requested.

JOHN W. HUGGINS.—Thanks. Will receive attention.

M. THEOBALD.—MSS. received. Will receive attention in order.

W. R. T.—The correspondence is closed. Your other communications are receiving due attention.

J. DIXON.—Thanks. There is no more. But the facts of mesmerism were not questioned, only the theory.

F. W. B.—We have done as you request. If we can be of further service we shall be glad. Candid investigators we are always ready to help.

JAMES B. SILKMAN.—Thanks for your card. We must judge for ourselves. The subscription to "LIGHT" is 10s. 10d. per annum. We have enclosed a subscription form.

R. CATLING.—We will look into the matter. But we do not wish you to lose in the meantime; kindly, therefore, send us the name and address of the person to whom "LIGHT" was to have been sent.

J. H. M.—The MS. has our attention. We could accept an abstract of the proposed lecture of the length of two columns, but a verbatim report would far exceed the limit of space at our command for the purpose.

W. TYSON.—After inquiry we find the best work for your purpose is "The Spiritual Harp," price 12s. 6d. This can be obtained (to order only) from America, through the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, S.W.

C. WEBSTER (Madras).—If Madame Blavatsky herself desires to answer the charge, and can bring forth substantial evidence in her defence, we will, of course, give her a hearing. You, however, admit that you "know nothing of the facts of the case." For that reason we do not think any good purpose could be served by publishing your letter, based as it is on mere supposition. You must further remember that Madame Blavatsky and others have hitherto failed to answer the grave charges made in "LIGHT" and elsewhere, and in some instances have allowed judgment to go by default.

GUSTAV ZORN.—There was no need for you to apologise as the circumstances were not of your own making. Do not hesitate to write and make use of our offer. Will a second-hand copy of "Statuism" suit you? That, we think, could be obtained at once. Your hint about Flammarion's allusions to "Psychometry" is of great service to us, as we intend to give a series of practical articles on the subject in "LIGHT" shortly. Your views with regard to Christianity and Buddhism are in very close agreement with our own. "Present Day Problems" is not issued yet, and it will not now appear until "Twixt Two Worlds" has been issued in the autumn. Will you please make a point of sending us for perusal the letters from the "Doctor"? You are by no means the first from whom we have received complaints. Please do not fail to communicate with us on all matters connected with your research.

We regret to have to announce the passing away, at Vichy, of Lord Houghton, a Spiritualist of many years' standing. The deceased nobleman attended many of the earlier sances of Mr. Home and Mr. Eglinton at the residence of the late Mrs. Makdougall Gregory and Mrs. Loftus-Otway.

At our last sance for experiments with our circle of four, one, M. Birmaun, we placed on the table a little Indian bronze tom-tom, suspended in a square frame, and requested that it might be sounded: but no sound came. M. Birmaun asked if we should place our fingers on the frame; the response was in the affirmative. We all did so. Presently sounds came. If it were possible to make an analogy between the audible and the visible, one might say that the sounds emitted by the tom-tom might be compared to electric sparks; they were short and unvibrating. When they ceased, we tried to reproduce them by striking the tom-tom with pencils, pens, tooth-picks, and pins, but in vain; we could get no similar sounds out of it. The sounds we had heard had come as if from within the metal. —Le Spiritisme.

TESTIMONY TO PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

The following is a list of eminent persons who, after personal investigation, have satisfied themselves of the reality of some of the phenomena generally known as Psychical or Spiritualistic.

N.B.—An asterisk is prefixed to those who have exchanged belief for knowledge.

SCIENCE.—The Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, F.R.S., President R.A.S.; W. Crookes, Fellow and Gold Medallist of the Royal Society; C. Varley, F.R.S., C.E.; A. R. Wallace, the eminent Naturalist; W. F. Barrett, F.R.S.E., Professor of Physics in the Royal College of Science, Dublin; Dr. Lockhart Robertson; *Dr. J. Elliotson, F.R.S., sometime President of the Royal Medical and Chirurgical Society of London; *Professor de Morgan, sometime President of the Mathematical Society of London; *Dr. Wm. Gregory, F.R.S.E., sometime Professor of Chemistry in the University of Edinburgh; *Dr. Ashburner, *Mr. Rutter, *Dr. Herbert Mayo, F.R.S., &c., &c.

*Professor F. Zöllner, of Leipzig, author of "Transcendental Physics," &c.; Professors G. T. Fechner, Scheibner, and J. H. Fichte, of Leipzig; Professor W. E. Weber, of Göttingen; Professor Hoffman, of Würzburg; Professor Party, of Berne; Professors Wagner and Butlerof, of Petersburg; Professors Hare and Mapes, of U.S.A.; Dr. Robert Fries, of Breslau; Mons. Camille Flammarion, Astronomer, &c., &c.

LITERATURE.—The Earl of Dunraven; T. A. Trollope; S. C. Hall; Gerald Massey; Captain R. Burton; Professor Cassal, LL.D.; *Lord Brougham; *Lord Lytton; *Lord Lyndhurst; *Archbishop Whately; *Dr. R. Chambers, F.R.S.E.; *W. M. Thackeray; *Nassau Senior; *George Thompson; *W. Howitt; *Serjeant Cox; *Mrs. Browning; Hon. Roden Noel, &c., &c.

Bishop Clarke, Rhode Island, U.S.A.; Darius Lyman U.S.A.; Professor W. Denton; Professor Alex. Wilder; Professor Hiram Corson; Professor George Bush; and twenty-four Judges and ex-Judges of the U.S. Courts; *Victor Hugo; Baron and Baroness von Vay; *W. Lloyd Garrison, U.S.A.; *Hon. R. Dale Owen, U.S.A.; *Hon. J. W. Edmonds, U.S.A.; *Epes Sargent; *Baron du Potet; *Count A. de Gasparin; *Baron L. de Guldenstäube, &c., &c.

SOCIAL POSITION.—H. I. H. Nicholas, Duke of Leuchtenberg; H. S. H. the Prince of Solms; H. S. H. Prince Albrecht of Solms; *H. S. H. Prince Emile of Sayn Wittgenstein; Hon. Alexander Aksakof, Imperial Councillor of Russia; the Countess of Caithness and Duchesse de Ponnar; the Hon. J. L. O'Sullivan, sometime Minister of U.S.A. at the Court of Lisbon; M. Favre-Clavairoz, late Consul-General of France at Trieste; the late Emperors of *Russia and *France; Presidents *Thiers and *Lincoln, &c., &c.

WHAT IS SAID OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

J. H. FICHTE, THE GERMAN PHILOSOPHER AND AUTHOR.—"Notwithstanding my age (83) and my exemption from the controversies of the day, I feel it my duty to bear testimony to the great fact of Spiritualism. No one should keep silent."

PROFESSOR DE MORGAN, PRESIDENT OF THE MATHEMATICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—"I am perfectly convinced that I have both seen and heard, in a manner which should make unbelief impossible, things called spiritual, which cannot be taken by a rational being to be capable of explanation by imposture, coincidence, or mistake. So far I feel the ground firm under me."

DR. ROBERT CHAMBERS.—"I have for many years known that these phenomena are real, as distinguished from impostures; and it is not yesterday that I concluded they were calculated to explain much that has been doubtful in the past; and when fully accepted, revolutionise the whole frame of human opinion on many important matters."—Extract from a Letter to A. Russel Wallace.

PROFESSOR HARE, EMERITUS PROFESSOR OF CHEMISTRY IN THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA.—"Far from abating my confidence in the inferences respecting the agencies of the spirits of deceased mortals, in the manifestations of which I have given an account in my work, I have, within the last nine months" (this was written in 1883), "had more striking evidences of that agency than those given in the work in question."

PROFESSOR CHALLIS, THE LATE PLUMERIAN PROFESSOR OF ASTRONOMY AT CAMBRIDGE.—"I have been unable to resist the large amount of testimony to such facts, which has come from many independent sources, and from a vast number of witnesses. . . . In short, the testimony has been so abundant and contemporaneous, that either the facts must be admitted to be such as are reported, or the possibility of certifying facts by human testimony must be given up."—Clerical Journal, June, 1862.

PROFESSOR GREGORY, F.R.S.E.—"The essential question is this, What are the proofs of the agency of departed spirits? Although I cannot say that I yet feel the sure and firm conviction on this point which I feel on some others, I am bound to say that the higher phenomena, recorded by so many truthful and honourable men, appear to me to render the spiritual hypothesis almost certain. . . . I believe that if I could myself see the higher phenomena alluded to I should be satisfied, as are all those who have had the best means of judging of the truth of the spiritual theory."

LORD BROUGHAM.—"There is but one question I would ask the author, Is the Spiritualism of this work foreign to our materialistic, manufacturing age? No; for amidst the varieties of mind which diverse circumstances produce are found those who cultivate man's highest faculties; to these the author addresses himself. But even in the most cloudless skies of scepticism I see a rain-cloud, if it be no bigger than a man's hand; it is modern Spiritualism."—Preface by Lord Brougham to "The Book of Nature." By C. O. Groom Napier, F.C.S.

THE LONDON DIALECTICAL COMMITTEE reported: "1. That sounds of a very varied character, apparently proceeding from articles of furniture, the floor and walls of the room—the vibrations accompanying which sounds are often distinctly perceptible to the touch—occur, without being produced by muscular action or mechanical contrivance. 2. That movements of heavy bodies take place without mechanical contrivance of any kind, or adequate exertion of muscular force by those present and frequently without contact or connection with any person. 3. That these sounds and movements often occur at the time and in the manner asked for by persons present, and, by means of a simple code of signals, answer questions and spell out coherent communications."

PROFESSOR BARRETT, F.R.S.E.—"I know and rejoice in the blessing Spiritualism has been to my own faith, and to that of several dear friends of mine. Moreover, I cordially recognise the fact that in bereavement and deep distress numbers have been cheered and consoled by the hope that Spiritualism has set before them. . . . So far from Materialism being true, I do not believe a single person has ever yet lived on this earth who has truly and heartily desired to know if an intelligent and personal existence be possible without our present bodily organism, and has steadily set himself to solve this supreme question with all the help he can gain from every source,—I say I do not believe any such earnest seeker after truth has ever failed to obtain a clear and definite answer in the affirmative."

CAMILLE FLAMMARION, THE FRENCH ASTRONOMER, AND MEMBER OF THE ACADEMIE FRANCAISE.—"I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambule,' 'mediumic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about; and also any man accustomed, by his professional avocations, to scientific observation—provided that his mind be not biased by pre-conceived opinions, nor his mental vision blinded by that opposite kind of illusion, unhappily too common in the learned world, which consists in imagining that the laws of Nature are already known to us, and that everything which appears to overstep the limit of our present formulas is impossible—may acquire a radical and absolute certainty of the reality of the facts alluded to."

CROWWELL F. VARLEY, F.R.S.—"Twenty-five years ago I was a hard-headed unbeliever. . . . Spiritual phenomena, however, suddenly and quite unexpectedly, were soon after developed in my own family. . . . This led me to inquire and to try numerous experiments in such a way as to preclude, as much as circumstances would permit, the possibility of trickery and self-deception." . . . He then details various phases of the phenomena which had come within the range of his personal experience, and continues: "Other and numerous phenomena have occurred, proving the existence (a) of forces unknown to science; (b) the power of instantly reading my thoughts; (c) the presence of some intelligence or intelligences controlling those powers. . . . That the phenomena occur there is overwhelming evidence, and it is too late now to deny their existence."

ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.G.S.—"My position, therefore, is that the phenomena of Spiritualism in their entirety do not require further confirmation. They are proved, quite as well as any facts are proved in other sciences, and it is not denial or quibbling that can disprove any of them, but only fresh facts and accurate deductions from those facts. When the opponents of Spiritualism can give a record of their researches approaching in duration and completeness to those of its advocates; and when they can discover and show in detail, either how the phenomena are produced or how the many sane and able men here referred to have been deluded into a coincident belief that they have witnessed them; and when they can prove the correctness of their theory by producing a like belief in a body of equally sane and able unbelievers—then, and not till then, will it be necessary for Spiritualists to produce fresh confirmation of facts which are, and always have been, sufficiently real and indisputable to satisfy any honest and persevering inquirer."—Miracles and Modern Spiritualism.

DR. LOCKHART ROBERTSON.—"The writer" (i.e., Dr. L. Robertson) "can now no more doubt the physical manifestations of so-called Spiritualism than he would any other fact, as, for example, the fall of the apple to the ground, of which his senses informed him. As stated above, there was no place or chance of anylegerdemain, or fraud, in these physical manifestations. He is aware, even from recent experience, of the impossibility of convincing anyone, by a mere narrative of events apparently so out of harmony with all our knowledge of the laws which govern the physical world, and he places these facts on record rather as an act of justice due to those whose similar statements he had elsewhere doubted and denied, than with either the desire or hope of convincing others. Yet he cannot doubt the ultimate recognition of facts of the truth of which he is so thoroughly convinced. Admit these physical manifestations, and a strange and wide world of research is opened to our inquiry. This field is new to the materialist mind of the last two centuries, which even in the writings of divines of the English Church, doubts and denies all spiritual manifestations and agencies, be they good or evil."—From a letter by Dr. Lockhart Robertson, published in the Dialectical Society's Report on Spiritualism, p. 24.

NASSAU WILLIAM SENIOR.—"No one can doubt that phenomena like these (Phrenology, Homeopathy, and Mesmerism) deserve to be observed, recorded, and arranged; and whether we call by the name of mesmerism, or by any other name, the science which proposes to do this, is a mere question of nomenclature. Among those who profess this science there may be careless observers, prejudiced recorders, and rash systematisers; their errors and defects may impede the progress of knowledge, but they will not stop it. And we have no doubt that, before the end of this century, the wonders which perplex almost equally those who accept and those who reject modern mesmerism will be distributed into defined classes, and found subject to ascertained laws—in other words, will become the subjects of a science." These views will prepare us for the following statement, made in the Spiritual Magazine, 1864, p. 336: "We have only to add, as a further tribute to the attainments and honours of Mr. Senior, that he was by long inquiry and experience a firm believer in spiritual power and manifestations. Mr. Home was his frequent guest, and Mr. Senior made no secret of his belief among his friends. He it was who recommended the publication of Mr. Home's recent work by Messrs. Longmans, and he authorised the publication, under initials, of one of the striking incidents there given, which happened to a near and dear member of his family."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the seances, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession.

"4th May, 1847.

ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another seance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this seance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847.

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a seance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid.

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved.

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, mehr Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect.

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the slightest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses.

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877.

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct seances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitterspirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful seance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

THE METAPHYSICAL SOCIETY.

By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

The August number of the Nineteenth Century contains an interesting account of a typical meeting of the once famous "Metaphysical Society," contributed by Mr. R. H. Hutton, editor of the Spectator. In a prefatory note Mr. Knowles gives an account of the formation of the Society, of which he acted as honorary secretary. In the autumn of 1868 the Poet Laureate and the Savilian Professor of Astronomy (Rev. Charles Pritchard) were Mr. Knowles' guests. A good deal of talk on speculative subjects led to the idea of forming a Theological Society for the frank and free discussion of such subjects. Mr. Knowles promised to form such a society, and found ready co-operation from such men as Deans Stanley and Alford, Archbishop Manning, Dr. Martineau, Dr. Ward (of the Dublin Review), Mr. Hutton (of the Spectator), on the one hand; and Professors Huxley and Tyndall, Mr. Froude, Mr. Walter Bagehot, and Sir John Lubbock on the other. The original name was wisely abandoned for that of "The Metaphysical Society," under which title the Society became famous. It was at various times joined by men of world-wide intellectual celebrity. In its list of members are included the names of Mr. Gladstone, the Duke of Argyll, Archbishop Thomson, Bishop Thirlwall, Bishop Magee, Lord Selbourne, Canon Barry, Dean Church, Rev. Mark Pattison, Professors Henry Sidgwick, Clifford, Seeley, Sylvester, St. George Mivart, and Lushington; Messrs. Frederick Harrison, Frederick Pollock, W. R. Greg, James Hinton, George Grove, Leslie Stephen, Fitzjames Stephen, John Morley, Grant Duff, Robert Lowe; Sir Alexander Grant, Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Froude, Dr. Maurice, Father Dalgairns, Dr. W. B. Carpenter, Rev. Dr. Mozley, and many others hardly less eminent.

This constellation of intellect, gathered from all sources, the one requisite for inclusion within it being an earnest thoughtfulness and intellectual capacity to deal with problems on which divergent views have been held, continued to shed its light—"light without heat," as Tennyson put it—on the dark places of thought for nearly twelve years, meeting once a month. The subjects discussed were of the most varied character. "The Theory of a Soul," "What is Death?" "Has a Frog a Soul?" "What is Matter?" "The Personality of God," "The Arguments for a Future Life," "The Soul before and after Death," "On the Words Nature, Natural, and Supernatural," "The Nature and Authority of Miracle," "Matter and Force," were among the subjects considered. The Society "finally came to an end, because, after twelve years of debating, there seemed little to be said which had not already been repeated more than once." It is much to be regretted that such an idea prevailed. There is room now, there always was room, and there always will be room for such a body of thinkers. I can conceive no time when they would not find a place for their disquisitions, short of that far-off Millennium when all perplexities shall cease, and all problems find a solution in the sunlight of perfect knowledge. We are a long way yet from that beatified condition. Moreover, since the Metaphysical Society died, fresh problems have arisen which clamour for discussion, and to-day there is a place and a work for such a society which many would be glad to see filled. It is also much to be regretted that no records of the papers and discussions of the Society exist. "They were absolutely confidential and unreported," and so are lost to us, to our great sorrow.

Mr. Hutton does not set himself to report any special meeting, but only to give "a reminiscence of the sort of debate that used to go on." The subject of this typical discussion was, "Can Experience prove the Uniformity of Nature?" Dr. Ward opened it in a paper, and Professor Huxley, Father Dalgairns, Mr. Ruskin, Mr. Bagehot (editor of the Economist), Mr. Fitzjames Stephen (now Mr. Justice Stephen) Archbishop (now Cardinal) Manning, and Dr. Martineau are represented as contributing a most interesting discussion.

In the course of the paper, Mr. Hutton gives some graphic word-pictures of the eminent men who surrounded him. We see Professor Huxley with "rich and resonant voice flashing out a sceptical defence of the use of the Bible in Board schools;" Mr. Fitzjames Stephen, with his deep bass voice, criticising the Claimant's adroit use of his committal for perjury; and Professor Tyndall, "with eloquent Irish voice, descending on a proposal for a prayer-gauge," which had lately been made at the instance of an eminent surgeon in the Contemporary Review. Here is James Hinton with his "wistful and sanguine, I had almost said hectic, idealism," and there "the ascetic Archbishop of Westminster, every nerve in his face expressive of some vivid feeling." Dr. Ward, "one of our most unique members, his mind, to his own apprehension at least, all strong lights and dark shadows. . . . A more candid man I never knew. He never ignored a difficulty, and never attempted to express an indistinct idea. His metaphysics were as sharp cut as crystals. He never seemed to see the half-lights of a question at all. There was no penumbra in his mind." Father Dalgairns, "one of Dr. Newman's immediate followers, who left the English Church and entered the Oratory of St. Philip Neri with him, a man of singular sweetness and openness of character, with something of a French type of playfulness in his expression." "Then we heard a deep-toned, musical voice which dwelt with slow emphasis on the most important words of each sentence, and which gave a singular force to the irony with which the speaker's expressions of belief were freely mingled. It was Mr. Ruskin's." And so the sketches go on: "Fitzjames Stephen remarking in the mighty bass that always exerted a sort of physical authority over us," and the "Archbishop of Westminster looking upon Mr. Stephen with a benign smile," as he administered to him a dose of St. Thomas Aquinas; and, as the Archbishop ceased, Dr. Martineau—"we had now got into a region where no less weighty a thinker would be adequate to the occasion—with a singularly perfect elocution, giving to all his consonants that distinct sound which is so rare in conversational speech." All the various personalities stand forth clear and distinct before us.

As to the debate itself, I am not about to present any summary of it. But some incidental points are interesting to the readers of this journal. Dr. Ward, we are told, "thought we might as well expect the uniformity of nature to be disproved by the efforts of Spiritualists to turn a table as the flood of latitudinarian thought to be arrested by Mr. Burgo's and Dean Goulburn's attempt to exclude the Dean of Westminster (Stanley) from the list of Select Preachers at Oxford." This question of the uniformity of nature crops up perpetually through the discussion, and always with a certain laxity of thought and expression. For the various speakers seem habitually to ignore the fact that we are but slenderly acquainted with the laws of nature, and that what seems to us on a given occasion to be "contrary to the known laws of nature" is possibly contrary only to such of those laws as we are at present acquainted with. Mr. Ruskin is the only speaker who seems to have realised this. "Assuming," he says, "the demonstrable uniformity of the laws or customs of nature which are known to us, it remains to me a difficult question what measure of interference with such law or custom we might logically hold miraculous, and what, on the contrary, we should treat only as proof of the existence of some other law hitherto undiscovered." And then he refers to the attested case in Paris of "a peasant girl, under certain conditions of morbid excitement, being able to move objects at some distance from her without touching them." Spiritualists know very well by repeated and most accurate observation that such power of moving objects without contact is a fact, as demonstrable and as fully demonstrated as other facts "in accordance with the known laws of nature" which scientific opinion accepts. His difficulty is the old and familiar one that men of science either scornfully refuse to investigate them at all, or give them but a superficial and timid attention chiefly for the purpose of founding upon their scanty observation some untenable but plausible theory. Witness the general refusal of men of science to investigate the phenomena of Spiritualism at all, and the theories which the scientific members of the Society for Psychical Research have considered sufficient to account for automatic writing and kindred phenomena. "The scientific man," says Professor Huxley in this discussion, "justly fears that if he investigates them [miracles] thoroughly, he shall wound many amiable men's hearts [i.e., by reporting against their beliefs], and that, if he does not wound amiable men's hearts, he shall compromise his own character as a man of science." That is the frankest confession I know of pure selfish vanity on the part of the man of science, and of bigoted intolerance on the part of his confrères.

"You must overcome," said the Archbishop of Westminster in the same debate, speaking of the Lourdes miracles so-called, "that violent prejudice in your minds which prevents you from vouchsafing even a glance at the evidence we have to offer you." Most excellent Archbishop! His words are veritable words of wisdom. But alas! they have little effect on the eminent men of "violent prejudice" to whom they were spoken. For when he implored them to "look into the evidence of the most astonishing cure of varicose veins which took place only last year in the South of France—a malady of thirty years' standing, and of steady progress throughout that time, attested on the positive evidence of French physicians who had themselves repeatedly seen and prescribed for the patient," he only elicited from Dr. Martineau the uninformative and inadequate remark that "such preternatural occurrences are usually mixed up with superstitions of all kinds, and so great a variety of hysterical emotions that I for one should despair of any good result from investigating minutely these curious conquests effected by pretentious physical marvels over the gaping intellectual credulity of moral coldness and disbelief." Ha! ha! So it seems that superstition and hysterical emotion can cure "in a single night," with the aid of a little water, a disease of thirty years' standing, which is certainly not dependent on imagination. By all means let superstition and hysteria flourish and abound amongst us to the confusion of disease and death!

Mr. Bagehot was of opinion that "it is impossible to say what the uniformity of nature means. We cannot exhaust the number of interfering causes which may break that uniformity." That is true: and it needs especially to be borne in mind by those who deal with the phenomena that engage the attention of the Spiritualist. The influence of mind on matter, the phenomena of human consciousness, the inherent powers of the human spirit, are but little understood. The interferences that may come from varied conditions of observation, or from the irresponsible will of the unseen beings with whom we have to do, are at present unknown quantities. We are exploring a new country, dealing with invisible beings of whom we know very little. There is no room for dogmatism. To use again a serviceable phrase, we are but children playing by the fringe of the great ocean, beyond which lies the land to which we are surely going. It is storm-tossed and wild one day, and we know enough to be able to say that a gale has lashed its surface. But on another day it is placid, and no ripple stirs its glassy calm, till suddenly a swell sets into shore, and the little waves roll in with no apparent cause. We know not why this sudden disturbance, but had we known more, had our horizon been wider, we should have seen a vessel passing by beyond our limited vision, and should have known that its wash was the unknown cause of the mysterious disturbance. We know so little that we should be modest. But what with the immature dabbler who knows everything, and has at his beck and call all the great ones of all the ages for his own private use and emolument; what with the purblind scientist who knows much about his own private burrow and little about anything else, and least of all about himself; and what with the omniscient theologian, foolish of all, and most conceited, therefore, it is monstrous hard for poor Truth to get any fair treatment.

SPIRITUALISTIC circles have been prohibited in Silesia. Recent irregularities in them are said to be some justification for this interference.

"TREASURE Digging in Consequence of Psychical Illusion and Hallucination," is an article by Herr Wittig, of much interest for psychologists, in Psychische Studien for July.

AN important work by E. von Hartmann—the great philosophical author—on "Spiritism" has been published. The author recommends an unprejudiced and exact investigation of the phenomena, and points out their immense importance for psychiatry, psychology, physiology, &c. He takes up arms against prejudice on all sides, disclaiming any partisanship, and seeking only the progress of knowledge.

Psychische Studien for July has, among its "Brief Notices" an interesting note on the origin of the symbol "R," by which medical prescriptions are still commenced. Though commonly supposed merely to signify the Latin word "Recipe" (take) it is said to be really a survival of astrology, and to stand for the symbol of Jupiter, to which this letter has some resemblance. Ashmole, however, explained it as "Responsum Raphaelis," a contemporary physician, Leo, professing to receive nearly all his prescriptions from this angel. Ashmole collected them in a manuscript book. It is suggested that these recipes are those of somnambulist curative mediums, whose transcendental powers are always dramatically represented in their dream-consciousness and ascribed to higher personalities. [For a full exposition of this necessary tendency of the transcendental faculties emerging in consciousness, Du Prel's "Philosophie der Mystik" will be found sufficiently convincing.]

BY S. EADON, M.D.

II.

It will not be inappropriate to point out persons most likely to be sensitives. They will usually be those the tone of whose health has been lowered by their modes of life, as men of sedentary habits, clerks, needle-women who work long and sit much, the hardworking student, and all who infringe systematically, for a livelihood, the organic laws, and bring about a relaxed and irritable state of the system. Sensitives may be arranged into three classes: first, the healthy sensitive; second, the sickly sensitive; third, the diseased sensitive. These manifest various degrees of impressionability—the Baron sometimes finding that those in the best state of health often saw the magnetic light with the greatest clearness. Besides these, there are the naturally-born sensitives; the somnambules; the easily mesmerised; the highly nervous, and those quickly put under biological impression; not to mention others with a cast of insanity about them, or with a sable cloud of melancholy ever overhanging them. Of natural sensitives there will be found about one in every twenty-five persons; and, according to the calculations of Count de Treston—who made nearly 2,000 experiments, and kept records of 1,200—about one-fourth or one-fifth of the whole population is susceptible to dynamic influence. It may be as well, also, before following up the subject further, to state why the Viennese philosopher selected the word "OD" to express his idea of this new force. Seeing that "OD" was found everywhere, but concentrated nowhere, and that no special or separate sense for its perception had been bestowed, as light for the eye, or sound for the ear; and, as no odylic battery had been invented to collect it, or odometer to measure it, it was found a matter of no little difficulty to select or invent a term expressive of the nature of this new force. The word "OD" was at length adopted, and its etymology is thus accounted for:—Va in Sanscrit means "to go." Vad-o (vad-ego—vad-eo—vad-o) in Latin signifies "I go." Vasa in Old Norse "I go quickly, or haste away," and is found as Wadan in old German, and means the all-pervading; and after passing through various dialects, this word assumes the form of Wodan or Odin, meaning "the all-pervading power," and which was finally personified into a German deity. Leaving out the postfix (in) there is left "OD" to indicate the name of a force which rushes through, and pervades universal nature, and which, in the ordinary conditions of humanity, has no special sense given for its perception.

From the experiments of Baron von Reichenbach with 162 sensitives, of all classes, of all ages, and of both sexes—professors, physicians, bankers, mechanics, Government officers, servants, noblemen, and even members of the Imperial family—it seems that the human body is enveloped in a delicately attenuated atmosphere, extending two or three inches from and around it; the right half of the body-atmosphere being of a bluish colour, the left half of a sort of orange-red. For the purposes of reciprocal influence, the odylic atmospheres of two persons need only touch at their circumferential edges without even interpenetrating each other in the slightest degree; but if one or both parties be inordinately impressionable an effect can be produced at the distance of inches, feet, and even of yards. Of course, body to body, as the right hand placed on the left shoulder, will give rise at once, or shortly, to a coolish agreeable sensation. This OD force streams from the finger ends, and if these blue dynamic fingers of the right hand stroke down the left shoulder of another person, gently and slowly to the elbow, a chain of innumerable cool points—in fact a sort of cold stripe will be felt, and this is called a pass by physicians of an advanced school of thought; and if a series of these "cool stripes" be scientifically made all over the body, an agreeable coolness will be perceived, a feeling of rest and composure induced at once, sweet charming, and delightful. It matters not whether this chain of innumerable cool points be made with the hand, or a crystal, or a bar of iron, or with a bit of stick, the effect will be the same, since every substance in nature, whether atom or world, is impregnated with OD. It streams from the Milky Way—the lengthened pathway of our own universe—and is probably the connecting link of suns and of planets, of visible universes, and of all telescopic nebulae; in short, perhaps, of all forms of matter, scattered throughout infinities, boundless, eternal, incomprehensible. As a cosmic force, Reichenbach calls it OD; but being an element in the constitution of man, it has been called by many different names: by Von Helmont, Mesmer Deleuze, and others, it was called magnetism. As a cosmic force OD or the Odylic force is the name now given to it; but, when thought of, in respect of man, human etherium would be, perhaps, as appropriate a name as any.

It is a strange thing—and yet a large developed self-esteem must be at the bottom of it—that people dare pass an opinion of either yea or nay on subjects to which they have never given a half-hour's serious thought or attention, and of which really and truly, they are mostly in profound ignorance; and yet society teems, thick as motes in a sun-beam, with people of this kind. These even are more excusable than another class—your clever or learned man, he who is distinguished in some domain of science or of literature. This kind of man will often condemn a new thought of which he knows nothing at all, from pride of place and position, and his opinion will frequently have great weight with people in virtue of the real knowledge which he possesses in another department of science. But this is absurd, and yet it is the way of many. It is only an independent mind here and there that has the courage to exclaim with Horace: "Nullius addictus jurare non verba magistri" (I will not pin my faith on any man's sleeve). His ignorance is no more wisdom per se because of his knowledge on other subjects, than that of the veriest clod-pole. His opinion, in his own domain of study, is valuable as he understands the subject in all its ramifications and bearings, but on subjects of which he is ignorant, and to which he has paid no attention, his assertions are worthless. Ipsæ dixit of people of this class, when society gets better educated throughout its every grade, will be appreciated at their true and correct value. No reflex glory from his own special department of study will either cast a shadow of doubt on any new truth, or lessen other people's estimate of it. There are those, both learned and ignorant, who have never given psychological and dynamic studies a moment's reflection, and yet they have the effrontery to say, off-hand, that no influence can possibly come from the human fingers, [although it is on record that thousands have been sent into a recuperative condition and cured of diseases of every kind; the blind made to see, the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, and, what is more, and to boot besides, sensitives, by the hundred, in pitchy darkness, have seen the fiery brushes of the Stroking Fingers as the blue light from the right hand streamed forth and commingled with those of the orange-red of the left. The human body is constantly producing OD, which has its normal, or healthy, as well as its abnormal, and unhealthy conditions; and it is not beyond the domain of probability to say of this delicate and subtle agent, that perturbations and reversal currents may be the cause of insanity in all its varying aspects and, likewise, of all those other distressing phenomena which come under the designation of nervous diseases. The induction of a chain of an almost countless number of cooling points is something more than a "lamentable maze of lying and deceit and superstition." It has, without doubt, laid the foundation of thousands of splendid cures, as may be read in the pages of the Zoist, of which the illustrious Dr. Elliotson was the bold, the dauntless, and the intrepid editor. "If any are sick let the elders be called together, put hands upon him, and let him be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord." But this must be no haphazard "touch," or "pass," or "cold stripe," but the star of science should shed its light, direct the process, and utilize the results. Blundering ought not to occur in any way, as the influence of OD on the sick is guided by fixed laws, and these must be known in order to draw out as much good as possible for the world of invalids from this extraordinary dynamic agent. May God have pity on the poor soul who, in mazy uncertainty, cannot obtain, or has not sense to look out for, dynamic help for his insanity, or to find means whereby to relieve the (to him) apparent mount-like accumulation of his nervous, and yet often laughed at, and pooh-pooled afflictions.

"JEAN PAUL AND PROFESSOR SCHELVER AS MAGNETISERS AT HEIDELBERG."

A recent number of Psychische Studien contains interesting particulars from the letters of Jean Paul of his personal experience in mesmerism. "I stand before the abyss of the spirit world!" he cried. On which Herr Wittig remarks: "But who in presence of all unexplained phenomena of life stands not before the same abyss, that is at the momentary frontier of his earthly being? Is not that which lies immediately beyond the frontier a possibly explicable transcendental, accessible to our earthly senses and faculties of comprehension, and after that the whole transcendent and 'Absolute,' or what is beyond all our experience, and is definitively cut off (logisch) from it?"

"Absolute" means "unattached" (Isogelüste), and therefore no longer knowable.* But in the presence of inexplicable (unexplained) earthly phenomena, people always believe that they are at the summit of the whole or partial transcendent† and Absolute, to which the necessarily presupposed Godhead and world of spirits belong, and have begun to unveil it, whereas we never unveil and grasp anything else than the transcendental.

MR. W. EGLINTON is in Norfolk, and will not return to town until September 12th.

IN consequence of the extreme pressure on our space this week many articles and communications stand over until our next issue. Reviews of "Healing by Faith," "The Missing Link of Modern Spiritualism," and "Karuna" may be specially mentioned.

A LADY who is about to visit the Italian and Swiss Lakes would be pleased to meet Spiritualists resident in their neighbourhood. As she wishes to see something of the movement in Italy, Switzerland, and the South of France, she would not object to vary her plans for this purpose. Address, R. L., care of the Editor of "LIGHT."

MRS. M. E. WILLIAMS, the well-known medium, and editress of the New York Beacon Light, has arrived in London, and is now residing at 3, Upper Bedford-place, Russell-square, W. As she is visiting Europe for rest, she does not intend to give sances, but we are requested to announce that she will be at home on Mondays and Thursdays from 2 p.m. to 5 p.m., when she will be pleased to receive friends and Spiritualists.

FRIENDS and subscribers desiring to obtain American and foreign books on Spiritualism can do so on application to the manager of the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand. Many of the works are kept in stock at the book-room, as well as a large new, and second-hand selection of the principal books published on the subject. This refers specially to the works published by Messrs. Colby and Rich of Boston, and the Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, Chicago. Any book not in stock can be promptly ordered and delivered in accordance with an arrangement made with these firms.

* The translator may be permitted to point out the coincidence between this idea and that expressed in the article, "Synonymism" (written before Psychische Studien came to hand), wherein it is remarked that the condition of spirit beyond all phenomenal, that is, "material" manifestation (is "Karuna"), is the true "supernatural," in other words the "Absolute," beyond positive or possible natural experience, that is, beyond objective knowledge, and thus beyond science and even philosophy. So far Herbert Spencer is surely right. † The distinction between these terms transcendental and transcendent, is that between what is beyond normal experience and what is beyond possible experience; between phenomena which in regard to their antecedents and conditions are beyond our present senses, and "things in themselves," which never can be sensibly apprehended. Why "the world of spirits" should be treated as "transcendent," the translator is unable to understand, since the intelligences we call "spirits" need not be altogether disembodied, that is without phenomenal manifestation for suitable senses.]

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER OF A SCEPTIC RESIDENT IN THE SPIRIT WORLD.

... There is frightful delusion prevailing here which leads millions astray who appear sound and sensible on every other point. It is that messages are received continually from men and women living in the planet earth, and that their forms even are often seen in our spirit substance, and if the silly trash they give us be truly reported, the contradictions which abound in their "evidence" is proof to me and all sensible spirits that there is no earth planet at all, or any material substance, or else they do not come from a material planet, and are simply a band of vile impostors if they really are seen at all. I will just relate some of the answers which I hear are given to the simplest questions, and you will at once see for yourself.

Q.—What size is your sun?

Some—The size of an orange, and golden coloured, full of light!

Others—The size of a large plate, and very red!

Others—It is many times larger than the earth, and its body is dark!

Q.—What is the motion of your sun?

Some—It rises in the East and sets in the West daily!

Others—It never moves at all, but the earth goes round it and turns on its own axis daily!

Others—It has a progressive motion of its own in which the earth and other planets are included!

Q.—What is your earth like?

Some—It is an abode of misery and pain!

Others—It is a place of delight and pleasure!

Others—It is full of want, fraud, and oppression!

Others—It is full of plenty and endless enjoyment!

Q.—Can you tell us of the interior of your earth?

Some—It is hollow, with a thin crust, and is filled with a raging fire which consumes the hardest rocks!

Others—It is quite solid!

Others—It is hollow, having a very thin crust, and the interior is a delightful region lighted by a soft and never-waning light, and a climate like perpetual spring!

Q.—How are your cities lighted when the sun goes "down"?

Some—They are lighted with oil lamps.

Others—With gas made from coal!

Others—With electricity!

Q.—What colours are known to you on earth?

Some—Seven!

Others—Twelve!

Others—Two hundred!

Q.—Whom do you worship?

Some—One God!

Others—Three Gods!

Others—A thousand Gods!

To the question, "What is your system of religion?" the replies were so endless and bewildering that it would be a long task to set them down.

Q.—What is your marriage law?

Some—We have but one, that of one woman to one man; this is God's law!

Others—We know of one custom, several women to one man; this is God's law.

Others—We know but one custom, several men to one woman; this is the Divine law!

Such are some of the replies given by these impostors. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion (and you must see I am right) that these appearances from earth in spirit substance are utter delusions, impositions, or worse, and if they were real, then there is no earth, no sun, no material planet or thing, since all these testimonies about them are mutually antagonistic and contradictory beyond hope of reconciliation. It is all a system of lies and imposture, and it were well if the laws in the planet I left were in force here, and these liars and vagabonds put in prison, or still better, burnt in the fire. The other day I heard a professor who ought to know better giving a lecture in the Temple, and telling us we ought to receive these lying messages with calmness and respect, however contradictory they might appear, in the hope that by classification and investigation we might arrive at the truth. Thus he ventured to suggest that these varying replies were all relatively true according to the perception, knowledge, and position of the persons who gave them.

This just shows how the highest minds in the sphere have been attacked with this delusion, and where it may end I know not. Some complain of a similar state of things on their earth—if their earth exists at all I should advise them to stay in it, for here it is infinitely worse. These delusions are believed in by everyone, and taken as a matter of course, except by a few, who, with me, have but recently left their planets, and have not yet cast off all their senses.—Contributed by American Camp Meetings.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Since my last I have paid a visit to the Spiritualist Camp Meeting at Onset Bay, and I think what I saw there may be interesting to your readers. Onset Bay is a charming little place, about fifty miles from Boston, and is rapidly developing into a place of considerable importance. There are quite a number of pretty houses and cottages, and several hotels, a fine temple, and a very delightful auditorium in a grove of beautiful trees. Sunday, the 12th July, was the opening day, and the exercises consisted of musical selections, vocal and instrumental, in the morning, followed by a very able lecture by Dr. F. L. H. Willis, who treated, in a lucid and logical manner, the various phenomena and truths of Modern Spiritualism. In the afternoon several fine impromptu poems were given through the mediumship of Miss Jennie Hogan, who in her turn was followed by the test medium, Mr. J. D. Stiles, who for the space of nearly an hour-and-a-half, under spirit control, gave test after test to the assembled crowd. Anything more remarkable than this gentleman's test mediumship it would be difficult to find. I am not exaggerating when I say that he gave the names and described the appearances of hundreds of spirits, giving full particulars as to names, business, ages, dates of passing away, &c., &c., and every name that he gave met a recognition from some one or other in the vast audience. I met quite a number of friends whose acquaintance I had made at Lake Pleasant in 1882, and I was everywhere cordially and kindly welcomed. Mr. Alborough was good enough to invite me to the evening séance of the Berry sisters, and I very gladly availed myself of his kind offer. I found a very large gathering there; indeed the rooms in the very pretty cottage tenanted by the Misses Berry were just as full as they could be without undue crowding. The circle was very harmonious, and the manifestations simply marvellous. The séance lasted about two hours, and with scarcely a moment's interruption spirit after spirit appeared before the curtain (indeed the first spirit appeared at the curtain before Miss Berry could have had time to reach her seat). I did not count the number of spirits that appeared, but I should say fifty, or pretty nearly that number; while the spirit that controlled Miss Berry stated that at least as many more were eager to come, and would have done so had the power sufficed. Four spirits manifested and spoke to me, and I had the satisfaction of recognising them all; first my brother-in-law, who passed away in 1872, and who was conspicuously tall (6ft. 4in.); next my mother, who gave me the spirit name she always uses, and who reminded me of her having already materialised at Mrs. Ross's (the account of which you will remember printing); and, lastly, my sister-in-law and her husband, who passed away in India within a month of each other nearly ten years ago, appeared arm-in-arm just as plainly and distinctly as they ever appeared in the earth-life; so distinct indeed were they that I recognised them the very moment they appeared although my seat was some way from the cabinet. There were several well-known mediums in the circle, viz., Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher, Mrs. Folsom Butler, and others; and several controlling spirits, notably "Dewdrop," the bright little angel that controls Mrs. Fletcher and whom I have long wished to see; and "Wildflower," who controls Mrs. Butler, materialised and came out amongst the sitters, apparently with as much ease and nonchalance as though they were mortals in the circle. "Wildflower" disappeared behind the curtain, and a moment afterwards what looked like a white handkerchief appeared on the floor in the front of the circle. Several people reached forward to pick it up when, like a flash of lightning, what at first looked like a handkerchief suddenly became "Wildflower," as plain and tangible as any mortal, and as full of life and glee as possible. I may add that my little friend "Dewdrop" called to me to come near her, and she then whispered a most wonderful test in my ear, which would have given me quite enough to think of for the rest of the evening, apart from any other manifestations.

I had read a good deal about these materialising sances in the Banner of Light, but I can only say no description, however vivid, can give anything like an idea of the marvellous facts that are presented at these circles. These facts are simply stupendous. The world may call fraud and may go on, to its eternal shame, persecuting and harassing its mediums, whom it should be the first duty of every intelligent Spiritualist to protect; still the work goes on and the light will not be kept back. I have seen a good deal of the movement since I came here, and I much regret having to say that in many instances the bitterest foes of Spiritualism are not those outside, but those inside the ranks, who seem to grow more narrow-minded instead of expanding, after getting some few experiences and glimpses behind the veil.

It is none of my business to act as censor, as I am only a chronicler of facts; still, as an intelligent observer, I cannot help seeing things that occur before me, and I incline to the opinion that there is too much desire upon the part of some to play "Pope" in this movement. Reference to the past history of the movement, however, shows pretty clearly that "the intelligent operators at the other end of the line" know their business a good deal better than the would-be "Popes" on this side, and so far as my experience and observation go, I find that the role of Pope is speedily followed by downfall and utter oblivion. Spiritualism, which is universal, cannot be made to run in party lines, and will continue its course despite all obstacles. I am getting pretty tired of hearing mediums abused, and it seems to me that if there is anything wrong about the mediums the most sensible thing the Spiritualists could do would be to surround the mediums with better conditions.

The fraternity of the White Cross, which has its headquarters in this city, is doing its work very quietly and unostentatiously, but none the less surely, and unless I am greatly mistaken, some movement for the better protection of mediums and for giving them more harmonious surroundings will have its inception ere long from this centre.—Yours faithfully,

Boston, 16th July, 1885.

J. G. MEUGENS.

BUENOS AYRES.—A correspondent writes: "We are here in hot debate with the Press, which is publishing articles against Spiritism in the names of religion and science. A writer in the Sud-America regards Spiritism as a kind of mental alcoholism. Against him our Constitución has taken up the cudgels."—Le Spiritisme.

THE Religio-Philosophical Journal criticises the Theosophy preached by Madame Blavatsky; it holds that "not only is the explanation of facts by the theory of the Occultists erroneous, but that the facts themselves are exaggerated, and sometimes imagined, when Spiritist truths are to be discredited." To us the Theosophico-Buddhistico-Materialistico-pseudo-spiritist edifice looks like a house of cards, having neither fact, reason, logic, nor tradition for a basis.—Le Spiritisme.

ZURICH.—M. Lengenfeld is giving an exhibition here of what he calls "Thought-reading." Among his audiences there have been University professors. He has found hidden objects; he has drawn on the black-board a geometrical figure which one of the professors said was in his mind; he drew the course of a military march imagined by an officer present; and he wrote the name of a deceased friend who was in the mind of Professor Kyma.—Le Spiritisme.

EXPOSURE OF A MEDIUM AT LEIPZIG.—A gross case of "materialisation" imposture has been detected at Leipzig. The medium was one Valesca Töpfer. The facts seem to have been absolutely conclusive of fraud, without the subsequent confession of the medium, who, while pleading guilty as regards the "materialisations," maintains the genuine character of her writing and speaking mediumship. The Leipzig journal which reports the case is, of course, jubilant. As usual, it is all over with Spiritualism!

VICTOR HUGO says, in the "Annales Politiques et Littéraires," "The butterfly is the caterpillar transformed; but it is still so much the caterpillar that every part of the creeping creature is, on examination, found in the winged creature; yet so complete is the transformation that, to appearance, it is a new creature. So, in our life beyond the grave, we shall not be bodiless spirits; such a term conveys no form to be imagined, nor to be reasoned upon. What could a life be without organs of life? What is a personality without form defining and fixing it? We shall probably have another body, radiant, divine, and, so to speak, a spiritual transformation of our earthly body."—Le Spiritisme.

THE
WORK ON "SPIRITISM."

The thanks of all Spiritualists, and, indeed, students of every branch of occult research, are due to Mr. C. C. Massey for his ready response to a request to undertake what is, at the best of times, a very laborious task. We refer to the translation for these columns of Dr. E. von Hartmann's brochure on "Spiritism." We have little doubt that long ere the completion of the task, the value of this addition to the literature of the subject will be manifest, and that Mr. Massey's generous labours will be duly appreciated. On more than one occasion Mr. Massey has contributed very largely to our store of knowledge in respect to the subjects with which we are specially concerned. This was notably the case with his able translation of Professor Zöllner's "Transcendental Physics," and we have little doubt that his present contribution will, though the last, not be the least valuable service he has rendered us. For ourselves, and in the name of our readers, we venture to assure Mr. Massey of our grateful appreciation of his labours. We have little to add to the introductory note which appears in another column. In the main it is what we should have written ourselves, and the position he takes up has many points of agreement with, and but few points of divergence from, that which we have, in common with many of our ablest contributors, always advocated. Spiritualism, as such, cannot fail to receive benefit from a critical analysis and the shedding of new light upon its facts, its theories, and its methods. Holding very strongly, as we do, that the spiritual theory is the legitimate outcome of the facts, viewed as a whole, we cannot fairly raise (nor should we in any circumstances wish to do so) the least objection to the closest scrutiny of the bases upon which we have founded our belief. We have insisted, over and over again, upon the fact that Spiritualism never has lost, nor do we believe it ever will lose, anything by free inquiry. Therefore, we feel sure there is no need for any apology for bringing Dr. Hartmann's views before the readers of "LIGHT."

It would not be fair to the author to discuss his arguments and theory piece-meal, and we have, therefore, decided to admit no discussion on his book until the completion of its publication in "LIGHT." When that occurs we hope our friends will thoroughly thresh out the matter.

A small edition will be issued in book form without alteration of, or addition to the original, except, perhaps, a note by the eminent author as a preface to the English edition.

And last, but not least, our hearty thanks are due to

Dr. von Hartmann for his ready and courteous consent to the translation of his work, and for which he has foregone the usual honorarium.

PRELIMINARY NOTE BY THE TRANSLATOR.

The eminent German philosopher, Eduard von Hartmann, author of "The Philosophy of the Unconscious," having consented to the translation of his recent pamphlet on "Spiritism," in the first instance for the columns of "LIGHT," I have undertaken the task at the request of the editor. In accordance with conditions very reasonably imposed by the distinguished author, the translation will be a complete one, and will be unaccompanied by any comments, liberty of prior or subsequent independent criticism of course remaining. I therefore take this opportunity briefly to explain why I am thus instrumental in reproducing a work with the conclusions of which I myself only partially agree. As also (which is more important), the disagreement of a majority of the subscribers to "LIGHT" is likely to be far greater, I shall be glad if what I have now to say represents the views and motives of the editor as well as my own.

I look upon this pamphlet as the most formidable attack that "Spiritism" has had yet to encounter. It is so on the very ground that will recommend much of it to our sympathetic attention. Hitherto, every serious opponent who has professed an examination of the subject has treated it either with defective information or defective candour, or both. The refutation could be left to the ever-recurring facts and the ever-widening range of public acquaintance with them. Now for the first time, a man of commanding intellectual position has dealt fairly by us as an opponent. He has taken the trouble to get up the facts, if not quite thoroughly, at least to an extent that indisputably qualifies him for critical examination. And while formally declining an unreserved acceptance of the evidence, he has come to the conclusion that the existence in the human organism of more forces and capacities than exact science has investigated is sufficiently accredited by historical and contemporary testimony (p. 23). He even urges research by State-appointed and paid commissions. He repudiates, with all the authority of a philosopher and man of science, the supposition that the facts are à priori incredible or "contrary to the laws of nature." He exposes the irrelevance of "exposures," and blows to the winds the stupid parallel between mediums and conjurers. And if his application of the psychology of somnambulism to the phenomena results, in his view, in "ruling out" spirits altogether, on the other hand it contains information to the public which is highly important for the protection of mediums.

On these grounds alone the expediency of this translation might be sufficiently defended. This is a subject in which we have to proceed step by step with the public, and while the question of fact is still in dispute, Dr. von Hartmann is virtually our ally, and an ally of the most important influence.

Up to this point our agreement with the author will only be qualified by a doubt as to the utility of his proposed scientific commissions. In his view this proposal is essential, and it is expressly motivated by an aim with which, when analysed, we can partly sympathise, but which we must in part repudiate, not as contrary to our convictions, but as opposed, we believe, to the true scientific spirit. We go with him heartily in wishing that the light of a new psychological science should be let in upon these phenomena; we shall all admit that they have been very imperfectly understood, and that the consequence of this ignorance has been a great deal of deplorable folly and credulity. We are also quite ready to entertain any explanation of the facts, however completely subversive of the whole hypothesis of spirit agency, provided only that such explanation does not, like others that have from time to time been offered, arbitrarily ignore or deny any fact simply because it is not covered by the theory. On the other hand, we find in the contemptuous denunciation of belief in spirits, as such belief, and not merely on the ground of ignorant misapplications, a defective guarantee for a perfectly unprejudiced examination. We see no difference in principle between the à priori negation, so well condemned by the author of this pamphlet, of facts, and the à priori negation of hypotheses which contain no logical contradiction. If the scientific commissions are to be appointed for the express purpose of eradicating Spiritism, and, as it were, with the instruction to eradicate it, they will be ipso facto, and scientifically, disqualified for the research. Negative pre-conceptions are as much to be avoided as positive ones. To one preliminary assumption only can we agree. Whatever the causes (as antecedents) of these phenomena, they are natural and explicable, in accordance with laws of nature, an assumption which by no means excludes the existence and operation of other intelligent agencies in nature than those directly perceptible by us, as objects of our present senses. The fallacy which relegates such agencies to "the supernatural," rests entirely on the assumption that material nature and its inhabitants are limited in range and constitution by the perceptive powers of any given stage of organic development. For an animal with less differentiated sense-organs than our own, much of our nature is non-existent. Has science learnt the lesson of evolution so ill as to commit the naïve error of considering existence, or nature, and present perceptibility as coincident?

Another point on which we are doubtful is the utility of the proposed commissions even for the verification of the facts. It is only necessary to refer to the account of the subjective conditions of their occurrence, given by von Hartmann himself, for the suggestion of this doubt. If the conditions are altogether, or mainly, subjective, the phenomena are little likely to be elicited by a mental attitude which, however intelligent and fair, would certainly not be in sympathy with that of the medium. Investigators have, it is true, succeeded without, or with only the appearance of such sympathy; but then they have not been already known by the medium to regard him as a physician regards an insane patient, or as a physiologist regards a living subject of "experiment" in his laboratory. Men of science may obtain, and have often obtained, as good results with mediums as the most emotional "Spiritist," but then they have not come with an official commission in their hands to expose the fallacy of the belief which is perhaps at the very root of the manifestations. I even believe that the phenomena I have myself witnessed have been less remarkable since I let it be known that I was not a believer in the agency of spirits of the dead in the physical manifestations. Certainly since then I have never had a "message" purporting to be thus derived.

But whatever deductions may be made from the value of the pamphlet on the above accounts, (as also, perhaps, on account of the prominence given to the very questionable hypothesis of the "implantation" of objective hallucinations from medium to circle) it contains much that we may profitably study for our own education. It is imperative that we should appreciate the possibilities, as well of physical extra-organic agency by the medium as of the somnambulant consciousness which may actuate it. Even granting the presence and action of spirits, mediumship must mean something, and the problem is what and how much it means. It is logically essential to exhaust the possibilities of the medium before we bring the spirits on the stage. Our first duty is to study such a standpoint as von Hartmann's, and the editor of this journal is doing well and wisely, in my opinion, in bringing it, at whatever sacrifice of space, most fully before his readers.

It may be that we shall find that the eminent author has not yet covered the whole ground. I believe that is so. With the largest allowance for the operation of nerve force and somnambulant functions of will and intelligence, there remains much evidence to which the explanations in this pamphlet are inadequate.

I refer, of course, to well-attested cases in which detailed and subsequently corroborated information has been given of deceased individuals of whom neither medium nor circle had ever before heard. Suppositions of old impressions received and retained without external consciousness may be pressed a great deal too far in the interests of a theory. Beyond a certain point they become highly improbable. Nor can evidence apparently outside the range of mediumistic phenomena, or of the intervention of a somnambulant consciousness, such as apparitions, hauntings, &c., be overlooked.

From the standpoint of von Hartmann's philosophy, the agency of spirits is an inadmissible hypothesis, and personal immortality is a delusion. The issue of psychological philosophy is now between his school and that of Du Prel and Hellenbach. Should the two latter prevail, for the "proof palpable" of immortality, to which "Spiritists" appeal, we shall have a proof psychological, which seems to me far better. Our belief will still be founded on facts, and that is the great claim which Modern Spiritism makes to public attention. But they will be facts better understood, related, and generalised.

And for many, no doubt, the "proof palpable" will easily survive this pamphlet. But no one who has not first read and understood the pamphlet has a right to say that the proof has survived. The author reproaches Spiritists with indifference to everything but the "interest of the heart" in these phenomena. We in England at least will prove to him that "the interest of the heart" is compatible with a resolution to be sound in the understanding, and with an intellectual appreciation of his argument.

C. C. MASSEY.

SPIRITISM.

BY EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

I. THE GENERAL STATE OF THE QUESTION.

The word "Spiritism" is of French production, the English, and generally the Germans, having retained the term "Spiritualism;" but it seems advisable to confine the latter to the metaphysical position opposed to Materialism, and not confounding it with the explanation of mediumistic phenomena by the co-operation of spirits, to designate that explanation by the recent term "Spiritism." The preponderating tendency in Spiritism is the American-English, which does not accept Re-incarnation, but mainly proceeds upon the Christian belief in immortality. In France the direction given by Allan Kardec prevails, namely, the inclination to the Indian belief that the soul has to re-incarnate itself in new bodies till it has realised its divine aspiration for perfection. In Germany, Hellenbach's transcendental individualism has a circle of adherents who teach the possibility, but not quite the necessity, of Re-incarnation, and are chiefly distinguished from French Spiritism by attaching just as little importance to the utterances of mediums as that school attaches much.

The number of Spiritist journals is considerable; Psychische Studien exchanges with fifty of them, and in Germany alone there are five. Most of them are uncritical and superstitiously credulous to a really incredible degree, the worst of all in this respect being the American reports, their value being further reduced by the fact that it is just in America that the humbug and swindles of professional mediums have reached their climax. Among German Spiritist journals the monthly Psychische Studien (Leipzig: Oswald Mutze, 1874-1885) occupies an exceptional position, the conductor, Dr. Wittig, representing with energy and critical acumen Cox's theory of psychic force and the hallucination hypothesis against the spirit hypothesis, especially in the last three years. It is characteristic of the whole movement that this attempt to secure a hearing for the voice of reason, and to raise his journal to a scientific level, can only be carried out in conflict with the chief of the paper and the majority of the staff,* and that its first result has been the springing up of several competitive papers. For as most of the subscribers to Spiritist journals have no scientific interest whatever in the explanation of the phenomena, but only the interest of the heart in the confirmation of their belief in immortality by means of them, the deprivation of this hope is at once the cessation of their whole interest in the matter.

Whoever will concern himself with the literature of the Spiritists must take up the position of a physician of the insane, who obtains from his patients the exactest description possible of their delusions; and he who has no patience to enter and become familiar with the circle of ideas and the typical modes of expression of this mental aberration will never fathom its psychological causes.

That a somnambule represents under an image, and as far as possible personifies, the ideas (Vorstellungen) of his middle-brain, is a psychological necessity over which as a somnambule he has no power. That a masked (larvierter) somnambule ascribes the intelligent manifestations of his somnambule consciousness, which his ordinary consciousness does not recognise as his "own," to foreign, invisible, personified intelligences, is not less psychologically necessary. Now if, further, those activities by which the, to him, unconscious intelligence of his masked somnambule consciousness mediates its manifestations, are produced by involuntary and unconscious impulse of his middle-brain (be it on the muscles of the limbs or vocal organs, or upon a still unknown nerve-force of mechanical agency), it is inevitable that he should deny these activities to be his own, and should look on them as immediate activities of those personified intelligences. And if with these processes is connected the faculty which the somnambule has of producing combined hallucinations of several sense-organs in the souls of sensitive persons present, the latter will be easily disposed, on account of the "palpability" of these combined hallucinations of sight, hearing, feeling, and touch, to take them for objective realities. And if, finally, the agreement of these implanted hallucinations is proved by several witnesses, the reality of the phenomena seems to them, as to the somnambule influencing them, scarcely to admit of further doubt.

All these intuitive fallacies have the same conformity to psychological law as deceptions of the senses. Abstract reflection may completely see through a deception of sense, without the latter ceasing to reproduce itself for perception as often as the conditions of its origination recur. For part of the mediumistic phenomena, especially the transfer of hallucination to third persons, undisturbed belief in the reality of the dream-personifications appears to be an almost indispensable condition in the somnambule evoking them, and to be at least favourable for effectuation in the witnesses. This explains why spectators encounter more developed phenomena with the growth of their spiritistic faith, and how an intolerant scepticism, which disdains to conform, even in appearance, to the ideas of the medium, must have a paralysing action on the latter's productive power.

From these preliminary remarks it will be already seen that in the phenomenal province on which Spiritism rests we have to do with essentially different conditions of research than in experiments with inorganic substances or organic bodies. A small part only of mediumistic phenomena is purely physical in its action, and even this part is connected in its origin with psychical conditions, with the disposition, confidence, and untroubled comfort of the medium. Now it is quite unwarranted for men of science to decline the examination of these phenomena because they are connected with conditions the re-establishment of which is not always in the power of the investigator.

If the flea of the mole, or the intestinal worm of the cricket is to be examined, moles and crickets must first be caught for the fleas and worms to be found. If particular forms of insanity are to be examined, the madhouses where such patients are to be found must be visited. If electric roaches or eels are to be examined, they must be obtained from their resorts. Just in the same way, if we would study abnormal phenomena of human nature we must seek out abnormally disposed natures or get them to come to us. Even the experiments of the laboratory are often so dependent on complicated conditions that the investigator cannot answer for success in every case; but this does not impair the demonstrative force of successful cases. If the electric roach is exhausted by the journey or is sick, the experiments with it must be just as unsatisfactory as those with a medium who is unwell; and if the dampness of the atmosphere exceeds a certain degree, experiments with an electrical friction machine will miscarry just as much as those with a medium. All this, however, cannot possibly prevent the investigation of abnormal phenomena.

Worse than the dependence on mediums and their disposition is the contest with intentional deception, which is certainly spared in the investigation with electric roaches. Here, however, we are reminded of the provinces of mental and nervous disease, hysteria and somnambulism, where the physician and the theorist have likewise to deal with the subtlest attempts at deception, without their scientific zeal being arrested on that account. A somnambule receives from his phantasmic personages directions which he punctually obeys, in the good faith that they are acting through him, and in his waking state swears with a good conscience that he knows nothing of those actions, holding them immediate performances of those figures of his phantasy. Similarly a medium in the somnambule state can play the part of a spirit and do things of which afterwards, when awake, he knows nothing, and which from the reports of the witnesses he must take for immediate spirit actions.

Whoever has been closely concerned with hysterical patients, without being their dupe, knows how finely and intricately good faith and deceit are entwined in them. Now all such mediums as are not merely magnetisers but also open or masked somnambules, are without exception individuals with a certain disorganisation of the nervous system; that is, the lower and middle nerve centres are too independent of the highest, reflex-prohibiting centre of conscious self-control; they are, in other words, just as much as non-mediumistic somnambules, and notwithstanding frequent appearance of bodily health, hysterical;* and their actions, whether in open or in masked somnambulism, are thus under the most favourable conditions imaginable for unconscious or half-conscious deceit. They are firmly convinced that the spirits help them, but are yet conscious that they are in some way indispensable to the spirits as a co-operating condition, that is, that the spirits can only act with their help. Is it a great step from this to the endeavour, on their own side, to help the spirits, so that the boundary between wholly voluntary, half-voluntary, and voluntary co-operation gets obliterated? Can generally the conception of "full accountability" be applied to a mental condition in which the organic-psychical collective energy is split between waking consciousness and somnam-

* It is necessary to explain that though Psychische Studien is described on the title page as "edited and superintended" (herausgegeben und redigiert) by Alex. von Aksakow, and Dr. Wittig describes himself as "editorial secretary" (Schreiber der Redaktion), the supremacy of the former seems merely nominal, the latter seems to be the responsible conductor of the paper.—Tr.

* That hysteria is not merely a female disease, has been considered established in France for twenty years, and in Germany has lately been placed beyond doubt by Mendel.

bulic consciousness, leaving for the first only a proportion, greater or less, of the normal intensity?

It must, I think, be of singular occurrence for a completely normal man to have the notion of coming out as a medium. The best qualified would evidently be conjurers, but these prefer to carry on their art before a larger circle of spectators, while to mediums are allotted the small profits of a narrow circle. One has heard, indeed, of many mediums who have become conjurers, but never of a conjurer who has become a medium. It may, therefore, be assumed that no one enters the career of a medium who has not accidentally discovered in himself abnormal properties and forces. Somewhat of these properties and forces may indeed belong to every one, but in so slight a degree that nothing special is to be done with them. In England 3 per cent.; in America, where the air is dryer, even 5 per cent. of people (der Menschen) are mediums to an extent worth cultivation. With women the development of these abnormal dispositions is more frequent than with men, with lean, nervous constitutions more frequent than with the stout, with young persons more frequent than with older ones, before puberty more frequent than afterwards.

The medium at self-discovery is usually as much astonished by the phenomena as are those about him; it requires long exercise so far to obtain control over his middle nerve centres as to be able voluntarily to place himself in the condition adapted to elicit the phenomena. As this exercise progresses, the phenomena increase in variety and strength, and his notoriety extends; by-and-bye he receives invitations to other towns and countries, with guarantee of compensation. If before he has been stimulated by vanity, now pecuniary interest is added; he neglects his ordinary calling and becomes a professional medium. It is disagreeable to him to accept money for unsuccessful sittings, and yet he must have money to live; he begins to help the spirits that so his customers may be satisfied.

The professional medium is paid for each sitting; the more sittings, the more money. But every sitting is a tension to the nervous system, and makes the medium more nervous, more hysterical, more powerless. As long as youth's store of force holds out, the thing prospers; then the exhausted mediumistic force abates considerably, and phenomena are rarer and weaker. But notoriety pursues him, and he has more invitations than he can accept; he sees before him money which he cannot earn. Now is the temptation to help the spirits urgent. Scarcely any professional medium is spared this diminishing phase of his mediumship, and it needs great strength of character again to take up the abandoned ordinary occupation after long erratic life. Many mediums prefer to become anti-Spiritists, and to entertain the public with the tricks by which they formerly helped the spirits, earning thereby, as a rule, much more than by genuine mediumship. Thereby also particular mediumistic performances, which can be produced in larger circles (e.g., thought-reading by contact and by the involuntary muscular movements of the directive person) are further carried on, and the anti-Spiritism is only used to conciliate the requisite confidence; the conjuring goes on at the same time, and the public is far more certainly duped by these anti-Spiritists than by the Spiritist mediums. Many mediums arrive at length at complete derangement of body and mind, become infirm or melancholy, and end in insanity or suicide. This is the case, not only with American mediums, but also with the Indian, although the latter can never make the thing pecuniarily profitable, and are far less tempted to exhaust their power by too frequent exercise; but the Indian mediums aim at just that derangement of mind and body which our medicine fears, and see in the gradual decay and dying away before death the most desirable goal.

Between a conjurer and a medium an important distinction is perceivable. The conjurer is independent of his health, of atmospheric conditions, of the dispositions towards him of those present, of the number of spectators, and light; on the other hand, he is dependent on the locality, on appliances, on the distance and position of the spectators, and in most performances on the preparations he has been able to make. He is seldom without confederates, and he has not to reckon with nervous exhaustion from the representation; he is dependent on certain conditions, but if these are not disturbed he is as good as sure of success. All this is otherwise with the medium.

The medium comes alone, without assistants and without apparatus, into a place which is strange and not accessible to him before the sitting. The Indian fakir appears naked, with only a rag round his loins; every sensible medium—and none others should be experimented with—willingly allows himself to be searched from head to foot before and after the sitting, and does not refuse to exchange, under inspection, the clothes he has brought on him for others newly provided of particular cut and colour. Every article he needs is received from the host, so that any preparation before the sitting is excluded. During the sitting the medium is immediately under the eyes of the spectators and in contact with them; but as he is influenced by their ideas and feelings, a malevolent, hostile, or frivolous disposition disturbs his psychical activity, and that equally whether he is conscious of the reason of this disturbance or not. Since each brings different thoughts, feelings, and influences, the disturbing influences are multiplied with the numbers of the spectators; mediumistic representations in the presence of more than three are antecedently to be suspected, and are usually only successful when among the spectators are mediums, who unconsciously reinforce the principal medium, and thus compensate for the disturbing influences.

The nervous relaxation and exhaustion of the medium is proportional to the abundance and strength of the results produced, but may, of course, be feigned or hypocritically exaggerated. Success is entirely uncertain, and if the medium is to be kept from all temptation to imposition, it must before all things be made clear to him that one is aware of this uncertainty of success, and will be in no way disappointed or impatient, though even many sittings should be without result. It is also to be recommended not to pay mediums for each sitting, but to arrange with them a fixed sum per month, or for a series of sittings, with free quarters, because with the fee for each sitting there is a powerful motive to deceptions.

Not less obstructive to mediumistic effects than damp air and evil disposition of the spectators, is the glaring light, which the conjurer prefers, so that it should not be thought that he was making things too easy for himself by darkness. Most mediums must first discover and develop their powers by dark sittings, till they are so far strengthened and inured as to be able to bear a moderate light. Only distinguished mediums succeed with full light; certain results, as for instance the levitation (Emporfliegen) of the medium, and the implantation of hallucinations in the spectators, seem under all circumstances to endure only a subdued light. As certainly as the different forms of the electric glimmer can only be observed in the dark chamber, so certainly also the phosphorescent lights, which are very common attendant phenomena of dark sittings, can only be witnessed in the dark. It is, therefore, impracticable to reject dark sittings altogether. Yet they should be confined to the study of these phenomena, and no value should be attributed to anything else occurring in them. Sleeves, boots, and cap of the medium, as perhaps other objects in the room, should be marked with self-luminous colours. Still better is the distribution of a number of weak electric lamps in the room, such as are now used for ornamentation. Even weak mediums can bear faint lights of a phosphorescent character, while stronger light (perhaps by its relation to electrical induction) has a disturbing effect.

All other investigations must and can be undertaken with subdued or bright light, then, what with the visibility of the medium's whole person and visitation and change of clothes before and after the sitting, there will be sufficient control to make sure against conjuring tricks. Altogether to be rejected is every binding of the medium, as a direct challenge to intentional and unintentional deception, and because conjurers in the loosing and retying of knots, and in slipping out and in of loops and fastenings are incredibly expert, so that only a conjurer can be competent to judge of the sufficiency of the fastenings. Besides which, fastening is a kind of supposed security which is painful to the medium, and, therefore, is unworthy, and almost every medium seeks to get free from the bonds as soon as he has fallen into the hypnotic or somnambulant state, and knows himself to be safe from the eyes of the spectators. Whoever relies on bonds, and neglects other control, may always be sure that he is deceived, and all reports of sittings of this kind are at once to be rejected as worthless.

Whoever holds his five senses to be insufficient, with the precautions supposed, to distinguish conjuring from involuntary phenomena, thereby declares the human organs of sense to be unadapted for the establishment of facts generally, and must equally renounce every judicial proof by witnesses and every scientific research. If a skilled conjurer can be introduced as a fourth at every sitting, that is certainly to be recommended, such an one having a professional interest to expose any conjuring, so that mediums may not compromise the vocation of the conjurer. It is notorious that the two best conjurers of Germany and France, Bellachini and Houdin, have given their testimony in favour of the mediums observed by them; other conjurers, on the other hand (Hermann for instance), have asserted their ability to reproduce artificially the same phenomena as those of mediums.

Examining the latter assertions more closely, and running through the anonymous "Confessions of a Medium," Cumberland's "Visitor from the Beyond," or similar revelations, it is at once seen that conjuring requires conditions and presuppositions which are not allowed to the medium. For example, for the writing at a distance one has only to take care that the medium gets the slate in his hand either not at all, or only at the last moment, to prevent a previous preparation, and need only make sure of the hand-holding, or of the secure closure of the slate, to make a direct writing by the finger of the medium impossible. As innumerable reports speak of an audible writing inside well fastened slates held by third persons or lying free upon the table; while some observers assert that they have seen the writing movement of the fragment of pencil on the slate held half under the table, and others even that they have perceived a self-erected pencil writing on paper,* it being also asserted that the writing is suspended when the chain of hands is broken, and is resumed when it is rejoined; further, that words or sentences, dictated for the first time by one of the circle to the medium after the slate has been fastened up or while the writing is proceeding, have been written within the securely closed slate; and also that in this way intelligent answers in the closed slate are obtained to written questions unknown to the medium (Ps. St. xi. 552); the like phenomena being proved by hundreds of observers, not only with Slade, but also with Monk, Eglinton, and different private mediums: now we may, indeed, doubt the credibility of all these witnesses, but certainly not doubt because under essentially different conditions similar effects can be attained by conjuring. However, the perusal of such exposures is to be recommended to every one taking part in these experiments, so that he may assure himself against the kinds of deception described.*

As with conjuring, so with the so-called "exposures" of supposed spirit forms; it is only by a misunderstanding that both are adduced against the facts alleged by so many witnesses. When a supposed apparition is seized, and only the medium is disclosed, an "exposure" has happened for those who imagined that the "apparition" was something else than the medium. But he who has already said that this result is in such cases the probable one, because scarcely five per cent. of the so-called "apparitions" are completely freed (abgelöst) from the medium, can no longer speak of "exposure" when the predicted result occurs. He who, rightly or wrongly, expects a phenomenon A, and obtains a phenomenon B, must as an exact investigator first of all examine B, and not play the bully (pochen) because B is not A, and in scorn of this result ignore B. He who in such cases is content to laugh at the medium, awakened by a rude shock from his somnambulant state, and not yet master of his senses, instead of immediately passing to the inquiry by what means the before inspected medium has brought about the altered aspect of the "apparition," shows by this conduct that he has no more interest in genuine investigation than have the believers in spirits, but has something quite different in view. Reading the narratives (naturally loosely reported by the newspapers) of "exposures," we soon perceive that the "exposers" have usually shown themselves still less qualified than the believers for experimentation, and are scarcely surprised that every such "exposure" has given a strong impetus to Spiritism.

Conscious and intentional deceptions by the medium can be guarded against, and their unconscious deceptions are among the subjects for investigation. So that it is not because a professional medium is to be regarded as a person more or less addicted to deception, that we need be so cowardly as to abjure all research with one, though it is also quite right that private mediums should be preferred. It is a logical fallacy to infer from the fact that a medium has cheated in one case, under certain conditions, that he has been always merely cheating under most different conditions; the conditions of every case have to be examined and one indubitable instance cannot be neutralised by a hundred negative ones. Now since private individuals have neither the requisite circumspection and practice in experimentation, nor the requisite authority with the public, it is most necessary that physicists, physiologists, and psychiatrists of distinction and official position, assisted by conjurers, should be commissioned to enter on this phenomenal province, and to institute long series of experiments with different mediums.

The public has by this time the right to know how the matter stands, and, not being itself in a position to form a judgment, it is dependent on the judgment of the office-bearers of science. The latter refuse to burn their fingers with these things, either because, in their conviction of the infallibility of science up to the present, they consider themselves qualified to decree à priori what is possible and what impossible, or merely because they have no desire to exchange the special departments of research with which they are familiar for another. Therefore the Governments must step in, and provide means for research in this department, since it is not to be expected of individuals that they should defray the cost of long series of sittings. Every

* Certainly the best of them are the anonymous "Confessions of a Medium" (by Chapman. London: Griffith and Farran, 1882), whereas Cumberland's "Besucher aus dem Jenseits" ("Visitor from the Other Side") Breslau: Schottlander, 1884), is a poor and repulsively affected imitation of the former. There is a German extract from the "Confessions" in Fritz Schulze's "Die Grundgedanken des Spiritismus" ("The Fundamental Ideas of Spiritism.") Leipzig: Guther, 1885. When a former medium takes to Anti-Spiritism, it follows that he denies his possibly former mediumistic power, and explains all his effects as mere conjuring.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—The Editor of "LIGHT" cannot, save in exceptional cases, undertake to answer correspondence through the post. All inquiries reaching this office not later than Wednesday morning, will, as far as practicable, be answered in the ensuing number of "LIGHT."

"VERA."—Will appear shortly. Can you send us the copies of The Lady to which you refer?

MRS. MALTBY.—The extreme pressure on our space this week has necessitated the curtailment of your notice. The important facts have, however, been given.

S. H. (Enfield, Paignton, South Devon).—There are several Spiritualists residing in Torquay, but we are not at liberty to give names without consent. Perhaps the paragraph in this issue will induce some of them to communicate with you. Will you send us a brief account of the occurrences you mention?

E. W. WALLIS.—Your request as to "LIGHT" has been attended to. We are sorry the paper does not commend itself to the Glasgow folk because of the lack of reports of the meetings of country societies. Our experience has been that such news almost always degenerates into a statement that So-and-so delivered "an oration" to "large and appreciative audiences," that his matter and style could only be described by at least a dozen adjectives, and so forth. We too regret the absence of "Notes by the Way," but the ill-health of the esteemed writer has been a matter beyond our control. "M.A. (Oxon.*)" hopes to commence these contributions at the latest by the beginning of 1886—perhaps before.

An inquirer into Spiritualism living forty-five miles from London, wishes to meet with a good physical medium to sit with a private circle for six weeks. Reference permitted to Editor of "LIGHT," as to bona fides of inquirer. Write, stating qualification, terms, &c., to B. Z., care of Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, London, S.W.

BERLIN.—A translation into German of Mr. J. S. Farmer's "New Basis of Belief in Immortality," by Count Schonfeldt, is announced. This will be a counterblow to the pamphlet misrepresenting Spiritualism published in German in Cumberland's name, but not written by him.—Le Spiritisme.

AMERICA.—The Independent Tribune, Waco, invites readers' attention to the fact that Spiritualism has endured a quarter of a century, and infers, therefore, that there must be reality in it. It dwells upon the circumstance that those who have made a serious study of so-called Spiritual phenomena have concluded that they are caused by invisible agents. It concludes with a quotation from some Spiritualist writer: "Spiritualism offers a faith based upon reason and experience; it leads to a contented mind in this present life, and dissipates morbid dread of the future."—Le Spiritisme.

AUSTRIA.—The Baroness Adelma Von Vay, an ardent Spiritualist, has started a good work for the poor school children of Gobonitz. Four hundred of them come into the town daily from the neighbouring districts. To give these children a mid-day meal, which they could not otherwise have, the Baroness has established a free kitchen. To help in meeting expenses she sells one of her books, Dem Zephyr abgelauscht, a collection of tales, at the price of two florins. Those of our readers who know German ought to buy it. They would have a good book and promote a good work.—Le Spiritisme.

CONCERT AT CAVENDISH ROOMS.—We have been asked to insert the following:—"I take the first opportunity of sincerely thanking those ladies and gentlemen who so kindly tendered their services at the Cavendish Rooms concert on Wednesday of last week, thereby contributing so largely to the success and enjoyment of the evening. I have also to thank the kind donors of the following sums towards the expenses: Mr. E. Dawson Rogers, £1 1s.; Mr. Morell Theobald, 10s. 6d.; "M.A. (Oxon.)," 10s.; Mrs. Stanhope Speer, 10s.; Mr. Arthur Maltby, 10s. 6d.; Mr. Ernest A. Tietkens, 5s.; Miss Smith, 5s.; Mr. Glendinning, 2s. 6d.; Mr. Treadwell, 2s.; a friend at Cavendish Rooms, 1s.—(Mrs.) A. F. MALTBY, 41, Shirland-road, Maida Vale, W."

La Vie Posthume (Life beyond the Grave) is a new monthly magazine (50 cent.) published at Marseilles. In its second number—chiefly of articles explanatory of the Spiritist doctrine—is a criticism by Madame George, the editor, upon a leader on Spiritism, appearing in a Marseilles paper, Le Citoyen, the writer of which agrees as to the reality of the Spiritist phenomena, but assigns them to the devil's agency. Madame George, in her paper, says that at a private séance recently there happened to be a lady visitor in full mourning. After communications to others present, a spirit addressed four lines of verse to her. They were given through the usual movements of the table, with the peculiarity that the last letter of the last word was the first dictated, and the first letter of the first word the last. The verses were to this effect: "The flesh alone is mortal; the spirit dies not, but ever progresses. He who dies is like the swallow who quits a sky become sad and drear, to fly to a sunnier clime." Madame George hopes the Citoyen will agree that if the devil dictated the lines he is becoming poetical and sympathetic.

prudent man must decline, as Baron Hellenbach did in his time, to deliver a confident judgment on the phenomena until he has had at least a hundred sittings with different mediums; but that could only be done by rich people with leisure, whose judgment, after sacrifice of their money and time, would have weight for no one but themselves. The existing materials are decidedly insufficient to pronounce the question ripe for sentence, but they are quite sufficient to pronounce it one demanding investigation. It is the duty of every Government to arrest needless mental confusion and excitement among its citizens, if that can be obviated by means so simple as the appointment of a scientific commission.

Spiritism is at present threatening to become a public calamity, to which every Government has to direct its attention; but it is not to be eradicated by prohibiting public discussion, as has been attempted in Russia. The superstitious belief in spirits is spreading epidemically, and opens to impostors new ways and means for the exploitation of credulity. All forms of mediæval superstition which were believed to be dead are awaking from their graves, and threaten a renewal of their mischief. These proceedings are already exciting anxiety in the guardians of religion; the representatives of a finer morality see their efforts overgrown by the re-inforced transcendent Egoism of a sensuously coarse form of belief in immortality. The champions of enlightenment know not what other position to take towards these aberrations than roundly to deny the facts underlying them, and to declare them to be mere fraud and swindling; from which nothing results but that their honesty is called in question by the Spiritists, and that the belief is screwed up to the point of fanaticism by à priori contradiction. In fact, it is doubtful on which side is to be found most superficiality, want of discernment, prejudice, credulity, and incapacity for distinguishing between observed facts and attendant suppositions, whether among the Spiritists, who in every accidental fall of an umbrella see the manifestation of a spirit hand, or among the enlighteners, who declare everything to be impossible which does not fit into their narrow picture of the world. It is high time that an end should be put to this state of confusion by official scientific investigation of the phenomena in question, so that the nature of the forces manifested in them should at length be made intelligible, and cease to be conducive to the grossest superstitions.

Having never been myself at a sitting, I am not in a position to form a judgment on the reality of the phenomena; this much only can I say, that were everything reported true, certainly new forces, hitherto uninvestigated, in man must be admitted, but that this notwithstanding there can be no sort of talk of an overthrow of laws of nature, or of an abandonment of the sphere of the natural. If, for example, a medium rises to the ceiling in a recumbent attitude, that does not prove for me that the law of gravity has been supernaturally suspended in him, but that he must be charged with some force whose repulsion to the earth is stronger than the attraction of gravitation; just as this is the case with the small elder-pith figures under the electric bell. He only, therefore, who claims knowledge of the whole range of natural forces, can have the audacity to determine what is possible or impossible, before experience and observation; but such a claim implying a complete misconception of the limitations of our knowledge, these apodictic predictions only disgrace the judgment of the men of science who allow themselves to be so far carried away.

MORS JANUA VITÆ*

By "M. A. (Oxox)."

In the August number of the Fortnightly Review Mr. Edwin Arnold has a speculative contemplation of the possible developments of the future as they affect the problem of man's immortality, and as they are affected by the recent researches of science, which is full of interest to us Spiritualists, who have given attention to these matters from another point of view. It is an open secret that Mr. Arnold himself is not unacquainted with the evidence on which we rely, and it is easy, though he never mentions Spiritualism at all, to see how he uses the knowledge that he has gained from it.

"Man is not by any means yet convinced of his immortality," though all the great religions have affirmed it; though some few persons "feel quite certain that they will never cease to exist," still, "no entirely accepted voice from the farther world proclaims it"; there is still wanting that "one word from the lips of some clearly accredited herald sent by the departed" which would set at rest the difficulties of humanity and resolve its recurrent doubts.

But is this so? As I read the eloquent phrases in which Mr. Arnold clothes his not unfamiliar questionings, I seemed to hear the utterance not less familiar of a higher and more authoritative voice, "Neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead," unless, indeed, I may add, they were prepared for it. These things are matters of development. We are passing through a transition epoch. "He that has ears to hear," does hear.

How happy should we all be, Mr. Arnold ruefully exclaims, if all this perplexity were done with. How fair a place this would be if we knew once and for all that death comes "as a mother lulling her children to sleep, so that they may make ready for play in the fresh morning."

If for "play" we may read "work" there is no objection to that statement. Death is the gate of life: of a wider and nobler existence, when each of us finds just that place that he has fitted himself for: the adit to a new phase of development, through which the soul that passes gains an additional training analogous to that which birth introduced it to in this world. Death, as Mr. Arnold says, comes as "the gentlest angel of all the ministers of man, bringing him much more than birth ever brought."

So far, there is nothing new here; but the old thesis is illustrated by some considerations drawn from the researches of science which are of importance.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Émile de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

"4th May, 1847. ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the varianism facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Percy, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M. A. (Oxox)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly. Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

think in terms of earth-experience, as we have to live by breathing earth-envelope." We ought to be reassured, therefore, when we find that no one can depict for us the coming life, "for it would prove sorely inadequate if it were at present intelligible. To know that we cannot now know is an immense promise of coming enlightenment. We only meditate safely when we realise that space, time, and the phenomena of sense are provisional forms of thought."

This truth is so familiar to the Spiritualist, who has thought at all respecting the phenomena with which he is familiar, that I need not enforce it. The Heaven of orthodox Christian theology with its harps, and its crowns, and its golden glories, is but a rather childish attempt to translate into the terminology of earthly life the half-imagined, wholly indescribable perfections of the state in which the emancipated spirit finds itself when death releases it from the prison-house of the body. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard," or if they have, it has not entered into the head of man fully to conceive of this Elysium of the blessed. Language, always inadequate for its best work here, is wholly unable to convey ideas which it was not framed to comprehend. But though this is plain truth, it remains also true that minute definition and adequate description of these scenes is not all that we are concerned with in our researches into these mysteries. Though we cannot aspire to all, we may yet learn much. If we cannot bring home to the listening ear the glories of that land to which we are going, we may convey in terms of our own thought, all inadequate as they must be, the fact that there is such a state of being, that in it the eternal principles which we have learned here find their due place and development, that we are now in embryo what we shall be there in growth, in each state adequately adapted to our environment, then and now struggling up to perfection. Mr. Edwin Arnold's argument would be satisfied by such a knowledge, leading to such results. If we can argue from the actual demonstrated existence of even a single man, after death has done its worst with him, we establish a possibility for the race. And it is not necessary that we should inquire afresh into the state of all the sons of men before we are permitted to generalise from a given number of observed cases. Nor is it any more necessary that we should have an accurate chart of that sea that we must cross, nor a map, in all respects complete, of the land to which we go; nor is it incumbent on us to feel able to translate into terms of our thought all the wonders that it contains, before we permit ourselves to learn about it all that its denizens can tell us. By all means let us bear in constant memory that our language is imperfect, that our knowledge is limited, and that there are there, as also here, glories that transcend alike conception and description, and then let us set ourselves humbly to work to learn all we can "before we go hence and be no more seen," before "the night cometh when no man can work."

Mr. Arnold, though he does not expressly follow this line of thought, yet evidently has it in mind. He sees that even here our faculties are limited, and yet that this limitation does not prevent our making the best use of them in our power. Our organ of vision is not as clear as the sensitised film which depicts what we cannot see; "bisulphide of carbon is aware of actinic rays invisible to us; selenium swells to light which is lost to our organism; the magnetic needle feels and obeys forces to which our most delicate nerves are insensible." It seems, therefore, within the range, and not beyond the rights, "of the imagination to entertain confident and happy dreams of successive states of real and conscious existence, rising by evolution through succeeding phases of endless life."

Science administers the possibility, though it may not rise into the sphere of hope. Revelation declares the fact, though it cannot rise out of the domain of faith. It is reserved for Spiritualism to add to the whisper of possibility, and the sigh of hope, and the prayer of faith, the assurance of demonstrated truth. To the age of doubt comes the evidence which alone it can accept; to the faithless and perverse generation the sign that it has vainly sought; to the materialistic mind, from which hope has long since faded, the scientific demonstration which will illumine its cheerless, cold philosophy—the philosophy of a dreamy negation, and a hopeless future—with the words of Spirit, which are also words of life.

"Nothing," says our writer, in a concluding passage of noble conception and elevated diction, "except ignorance and despondency forbids the belief that the senses so etherialised and enhanced, and so fitly adapted to the fine combinations of advanced entity, would discover without much amazement sweet and friendly societies springing from, but proportionately raised above, the old associations; art divinely elevated; science splendidly expanding; bygone loves and sympathies explaining and obtaining their purpose; activities set free for vaster cosmic service; abandoned hopes realised at last; despaired-of joys come magically within ready reach; regrets and repentances, softened by wider knowledge, sever foresight, and the discovery that though in this universe nothing can be 'forgiven,' everything may be repaid and repaired."

"To call such a life 'Heaven' or the 'Hereafter' is a concession to the illusions of speech and thought, for these words imply locality and time, which are but provisional conceptions. It would rather be a state, a plane of faculties to expand again into other and higher states or planes; the slowest and lowest in the race of life coming in last, but each—everywhere—finally attaining."

Surely a foregleam of a truly Beatific Vision!

ANGELS.

Good angels still conduct from age to age,
Humanity on nature's pilgrimage;
Cherubic swords, no longer sign of strife,
Now point the way and keep the Tree of Life;
Seraphic hands, with coils of living fire
The lips of God's true Messengers inspire;
Angels who see their Heavenly Father's face
Watch o'er His little ones with special grace;
Angels with healing virtue on their wings
Trouble rank pools, unsluice salubrious springs,
Till fresh as life new-born, the waters roll;
Lepers and lame step in, and are made whole;
Angels the saints from noonday perils keep,
Encamp around their couches while they sleep,
Uphold them where they seem to walk alone,
Nor let them dash their foot against a stone
They teach the dumb to speak, the blind to see,
Comfort the dying in their agony,
And to the Paradise of rest convey Spirits enfranchised from the fettering clay.
Sheffield, August 10th, 1829. JAMES MONTGOMERY.

EVIL SPIRITS.—Spiritualists say that many manifesting spirits exhibit dispositions that are more or less evil; and they have a hypothesis that spirits continue to be swayed by the feelings that ruled them in the body. According to the same hypothesis, spirits, passing in evil into the other world, not having the conditions there for satisfying their impulses, try to fix themselves upon sensitives and act upon them as mediums, tempting them to different kinds of wickedness. In other words, they do what theologians charge against the devil, with the aggravating difference that they psychologise their very personal passions into their mediums! Such a hypothesis is very saddening,—that after a wretched life on earth one is to find oneself in the land of souls, moved by the same wretched disposition, to search about for an earthly sensitive on whom to fasten and urge to actions for the satisfaction of inveterate impulses to this or that evil, even murder. There are points about this hypothesis of evil spirits which we should like to be made clearer.—J. S. LOVELAND, in the Spiritual Offering.

Yes! but not his—'tis Death itself there dies.—Coleridge.

SOME ODD "FADS" AND FANCIES; THEIR RATIONALE AND EXPLANATION.

By S. EADON, M.D.

III.

The sources whence OD emanates may be shown in many ways. Open a champagne bottle in the presence of a sensitive in the dark, the bottle will appear all of a glow, as if illuminated with snow, with a light wavering cloud hovering over it. This is OD from effervescence. Throw a spoonful of table salt into a glass of water in the dark, shake it, and the sensitive sees the water full of bright light, and if the glass is taken into the left hand it will feel cold. This is OD from a simple solution. Put a wire of copper or zinc in a glass of diluted sulphuric acid, the whole wire, to a sensitive, will be all on fire, and its upper end will blaze forth like the flame of a candle, only weaker. This is OD from dissolving metals in acids. Dissolve a soda-powder in half a tumbler of water; in another, a powder of tartaric acid; pour the contents of the one into that of the other; instantly the mixture glows with a bright light, and a large white flame rises from the surface. This is the development of OD from chemical decomposition. All chemical action develops OD rapidly, but the source exhausts itself as soon as the play of the affinities is at an end.

Putrefaction in a state of fermentation and all these substances give out the Odie light. This naturally takes us to the churchyard, and to the ghosts, real or unreal which old women, and many others, from time immemorial have always affirmed to have been seen, and which are said to be departed souls, wandering in garments of fire about their graves till they have atoned for their sins and obtained eternal rest. Such is the superstition; but the torch of science will dispel this illusion. With the idea of putrefaction in his mind, Reichenbach took a sensitive, Miss Leopoldine Reichel, into a neighbouring churchyard, and also into the cemeteries of Vienna, to test these said stories about the fiery ghosts. Over many graves she saw fiery apparitions, some as large as men, others like dwarfish sprites, making uniform movements like a row of dancers, or like soldiers exercising. The old graves had no such visitants. As the lady approached them their apparently human forms disappeared and showed themselves instead as merely light vapours driven to and fro by the wind. She stepped into one of them, it rose to her neck and was broken through by her clothes. She drew a figure on the earth of this grave with her umbrella, and the marks were more visible from the increased vapour which came up from these newly-formed furrows; and this was the result with regard to all the vapour-forms which moved over all the newly-made graves. A young man, called Billing, in Holy Orders, was once walking with his friend Pleffell, the poet, and suddenly stopped. He was asked why he stopped. Oh! nothing; but, he said, he always felt peculiar when in the vicinity of human remains. No one knew that a dead body was there. At night he was brought to the same spot and saw vapour dancing up and down, not unlike a human female figure with the hand on the breast. The ground was dug, a body was found, but afterwards removed and the grave filled up. unknown to Billing. Next night Billing was brought to the same spot again but he could see nothing. The old women really saw something which, to them, looked like human figures, but which Reichenbach's experiments now demonstrate to be merely putrefying matters emanating from recent corpses, dancing in the wind; in fact, nothing more than gas or vapour, composed of carbonate of ammonia, phosphorated hydrogen and other known products of decomposition, which, in their ascent through the earth, give out, at the surface, odie light—the so-called ghosts of the superstitious of all ages. Over old graves, i.e., when decomposition has ceased, these vapours, or unreal ghosts, are invisible to sensitives and non-sensitives alike. Well, then, after all, it was a fact, that old women, who were really natural sensitives, did see moving, fiery forms in churchyards, which their imaginations pictured as ghosts, but which this modern science has proved to be merely natural phenomena—the results of putrefaction—the odie lights perceived by these sensitives, telling the tale how rapidly decomposition was going on in the ground beneath.

When the bell-glass of an air pump was struck with a key, a light was at once visible with the sound, and the louder the sound the brighter the light. This experiment was tried with a horseshoe magnet, a metallic bar, and other substances, and with a similar result. When a violin was played upon, the string and sounding board vibrated with fervid light; and a tumbler, struck with a knife, to the sensitive, in the dark chamber, appeared to put on a garment of light, bright in proportion as the tone was high. From this, it is inferred there is OD in sound.

Can OD be developed by the friction of solids, or by the friction of liquids against solids? In order to test the development of OD by the friction of solids, a copper wire was fastened into a little board, the other end being held by a sensitive, Miss Maria Maix. This board was now rubbed with another like it, and a sensation of warmth was at once felt by the sensitive. The end of the wire was next rubbed on a grindstone, the whole length of wire glowed with OD, and from its turned-up end a flame, like that of a candle, arose. From this experiment the friction of solids evidently produced OD. Next it was tried whether the friction of fluids against solids would elude it. Closed bottles containing alcohol, ether, acetic acid, creosote, turpentine, and water, were each shaken in the dark, and to the sensitive each glowed with light and, if the bottle was held in the left hand, there was felt a disagreeable lukewarm sensation. If the shaking of the water sets OD in motion though, Reichenbach, will not this prove to be the solution to all the wonders of the Divining Rod in the hands of Monsieur Saurcier, the celebrated French water-finder and, indeed, of all other water-hunters and vein-discoverers in all ages, and in all parts of the world? The sequel will show.

ROME.—The Senator Borelli has published a pamphlet entitled, "The Origin and Destiny of Man," which contains many spiritual communications on philosophy and morals.

A SOCIETY for Psychical Research, which professes to scientifically investigate the phenomena of Magnetism and Spiritualism, has been formed at Chicago, and was inaugurated last June under the presidency of Dr. Reeves-Jackson.

THE Saratoga Eagle announces that the Rev. J. Newman, a distinguished preacher of the Methodist Church, and intimate friend of the late General Grant, is said to have resolved upon his abandoning his connection with the Methodist Church to attach himself henceforth to the free philosophy of Spiritualism.

THE American Spiritualist papers, and not those alone, but many other journals, are filled now with reports of the summer camp meetings, at which thousands assemble in pleasant places and spend weeks in attending seances and listening to noted platform speakers. We have nothing like it in England, because, perhaps, for one reason, the weather cannot be depended upon, so that we have never got used to protracted picnics. Then the people of all new countries are gregarious.

THE Psychological Press (16, Craven-street Strand, W.C.) have received from the publishers a small supply of "The Biogen Series," Nos. 2 and 3, viz., "The Demon of Darwin," by Professor Elliott Coues and, "A Buddhist Catechism," annotated by the same author. Further particulars will be found in our advertisement columns. These books were reviewed in our issues for August 8th and 15th. "Biogen," by Professor Coues, being No. 1 of the same series, the fourth American edition of which has been issued in America, is also expected in a short time.

INDIAN MAGIC.

(Abridged from "Casell's Saturday Journal," July 18th.)

"I was travelling through Anam with a party of German officials, when we stopped one night where a number of magicians were resting. There were six, four men and two women, all small, except one, who was gigantic. I made their acquaintance, as I was then interested in legordemain, and won their good-will. They were eager for me to show my skill. I did so, but in every case they caught me and laughed at my efforts, excepting in one trick—the 'Pharaoh's serpent,' so much in vogue some years ago.

"After I finished, the doors were closed, and only those admitted who paid a small fee, and soon, the apartment being filled, the magicians began. The audience sat on the floor around them, so that the performers had no way of concealing themselves or of hiding anything. At their request I satisfied myself that they had nothing about them. Then one of the women stepped into the enclosure, the rest remaining behind the spectators. The light was now lessened, and the woman's face became gradually illumined by a ghostly light that extended quickly over her entire body. She then moved round and round, uttering a low, murmuring sound, gradually quickening the pace until she whirled about like a top. Then the light that had clung about her seemed to be whirled off and assumed a pillar-like form beside her; then she stopped, turned, and began to mould the light with her hands until it assumed a form, with face and headgear. She next called for a light, and, all the candles being relighted, there stood a stranger, native, seemingly evolved out of cloudland. He stepped forward and grasped my hand; his hand was moist, as if with perspiration.

"The lights were lessened, but not so much that we could not see; and in a few moments the new figure began to fade, soon assuming the appearance of a pillar, or form of light, and then, attaching itself to the woman, was seemingly absorbed into her form. All this was done before, at least, fifty people, and not ten feet from myself. The woman appeared exhausted.

"The giant next took his place in the ring, and, handing a sabre to me, said: 'In five minutes I wish you to behold me.' I objected, but he said it had been done many times; so I finally agreed. In the dim light he twisted himself about, grew perceptibly smaller, and finally stood before us so gauzy that I thought I could see through him. The five minutes past, I took the sabre and struck his neck a light blow, when, to my horror, the blood spouted, and the head fell upon the floor; then the body stooped, picked it up, held it in the air, and then placed it upon the shoulders. Full light being restored, there stood the giant grinning.

"The blood? That had faded away. All the party now stepped into the ring, and began to chant and move about. In a few minutes they ceased, and we observed that one was missing though no one saw him go. A moment after, the whirling was repeated, and another was found to have disappeared, and so on, until in fifteen minutes only the giant was there. More light was now called for, a noise was heard at the door, and on its being opened there stood the five! That ended the performance for the night. I sat up well into the morning, trying to make out how it was all done. The natives said it was magic, and I began to think that was the easiest way out of my difficulty.

"The following day another performance was given at mid-day. The giant, as I call him, caused the audience to sit on a grass plat, leaving a circle of about twenty-five feet across, and in this the magicians took their places, the giant opening proceedings by taking a roll of ribbon, and, by a dexterous toss, he sent it up fifty feet or so, where we saw a hawk dart at it and carry it up higher, until we nearly lost sight of it. It then seemed to enter a cloud; but from the cloud came sailing down the ribbon first a dog, then a snake that wriggled off the moment it touched the ground, but was captured by the men; then a larger object came sliding down, and one of the women, leaping forward, received and held out to the crowd—a laughing native baby. The giant had all this time held the end of the ribbon; and, letting it go now, it seemed to disappear in the air; at any rate, we saw it no more."

COINCIDENT DREAMING.—Referring to a suggestion by Perty "that witches may have had many dreams of their Sabbath in common," Psychische Studien for July adduces a very striking case of this from a book of the seventeenth century, entitled "De Fascinatiane," by Frommann, a physician of Coburg. This case is said by Herr Kiesewetter to be unique in witch literature.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions: (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

- | | |
|---|---|
| A.—Mesmerism. | K.—Spirit Identity. |
| B.—Trance. | L.—Materialised Spirit Forms. |
| C.—Clairvoyance. | M.—The Spirit Rap. |
| D.—Thought-reading. | N.—The Spirit Voice. |
| E.—Previsional and Coincidental Dreams. | O.—Psychography. |
| F.—Apparitions. | P.—Automatic Writing. |
| G.—The Human "Double." | Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact. |
| H.—Presence at a Distance. | R.—Miscellaneous Phenomena. |
| I.—Haunted Houses. | |

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

CLASSES A—MESMERISM; AND C—CLAIRVOYANCE.

I had heard from a friend, Mr. M., of the somewhat remarkable powers of a clairvoyant subject of Mr. W. R. Price, of Peckham.

It occurred to me to consult this lady, Mrs. B., in reference to a mesmeric subject of my own, Alice H., whom I had put to sleep thirty or forty times without obtaining any better results than those depending upon suggestion, or the exercise of my will. I was desirous of developing the clairvoyant faculty, and the object of the interview in question was to have the opinion of Mrs. B. as to the probability of success.

There were present—Mr. Price (mesmerist); Mrs. B. (subject); and myself.

I had previously obtained a lock of hair from my subject to serve as a clue. Almost as soon as this was placed in her hand Mrs. B. declared herself in communication with Alice H., then over six miles away. Mrs. B. gave—

A description of Alice H., physically and mentally. (Correct.)

A description of the mode of operating I had employed and what its effects had been. (Correct in essentials.)

A criticism of this method, showing why I had not succeeded in producing the "higher phenomena."

Minute instructions for future guidance, including directions how to make the passes, how frequently to induce the sleep, and other particulars based upon the idiosyncracies of the person to be mesmerised.

The results of the short trial I have been able to give the method advised are as follows:—

It required fifteen minutes to produce the sleep, instead of one minute as before.

The patient described herself as in a new condition.

She had no recollection of any previous sleep, although in the former state she could recall the events of each preceding sleep if desired.

She was not subject to impressions or to any will.

Of course it would be premature to expect clairvoyance at present, but these facts suffice to show that by Mrs. B.'s instruction I have produced a condition differing from that obtained by my previous method, and which my subject, in the sleep, has stated will meet with success.

I have left the most striking fact till the last.

In her preliminary diagnosis of the condition of Alice H., Mrs. B. alluded to a weakness in the left eye.

This was at variance with my belief at the time, and was, indeed, the only statement made to which I had reason to take exception. I felt certain that had such been the case I should have been aware of the fact.

With no further "leading" than the question whether her eyes were all right, Alice H. told me that her left eye had been operated upon for an injury in childhood, some eight or nine years ago. The organ was very weak for over a year afterwards, but, as no inconvenience had been felt for some years past, it had not occurred to her to mention it to me.

CLASS E.—PREVISIONAL DREAMS.

On the 3rd of June my sister came downstairs and informed us that she had had a dream, in which she had seen a brother who lives in Douglas. His face was as white as a corpse, and he had a large wound on his forehead, the blood from which made him look a ghastly object.

So convinced was she that he was in danger that she went from Crosby to Douglas, on the 5th June, a distance of five miles, and told his wife of her dream. She took no heed to the warning, and looked on it as most persons do on dreams. On June 20th my sister was in Douglas on business, and was seated in a car at the door of my brother's place of business there, when he rushed out and ran over the street to the nearest chemist's shop with the blood streaming from his forehead, and his face looking as she had seen it in her dream. He had been handling an aerated water bottle when it burst and opened a vein in his forehead which was stopped with great difficulty.

"WHAT THE INDIANS BELIEVE."

The following story is taken from Washington Irving's "Tour on the Prairies":—

"I will here add a little story, which I picked up in the course of my tour through Beattie's country, and which illustrates the superstitions of his Osage kindred. A large party of Osages had been encamped for some time on the borders of a fine stream, called the Nickanansa. Among them was a young hunter, one of the bravest and most graceful of the tribe, who was to be married to an Osage girl, who, for her beauty, was called the Flower of the Prairies. The young hunter left her for a time among her relatives in the encampment, and went to St. Louis to dispose of the products of his hunting, and purchase ornaments for his bride. After an absence of some weeks he returned to the banks of the Nickanansa, but the camp was no longer there; the bare frames of the lodges and the brands of extinguished fires alone marked the place. At a distance he beheld a female seated, as if weeping, by the side of the stream. It was his affianced bride. He ran to embrace her, but she turned mournfully away. He dreaded lest some evil had befallen the camp.

"Where are our people?" cried he.

"They are gone to the banks of the Wagrushka."

"And what art thou doing here alone?"

"Waiting for thee."

"Then let us hasten to join our people on the banks of the Wagrushka."

"He gave her his pack to carry and walked ahead, according to the Indian custom.

"They came to where the smoke of the distant camp was seen rising from the woody margin of the stream. The girl seated herself at the foot of a tree.

"It is not proper for us to return together," said she. "I will wait here."

"The young hunter proceeded to the camp alone, and was received by his relations with gloomy countenances.

"What evil has happened," said he, "that ye are all so sad?"

"No one replied.

"He turned to his favourite sister, and bade her go forth, seek his bride, and conduct her to the camp."

"Alas!" cried she, "how shall I seek her? She died a few days since."

"The relations of the young girl now surrounded him, weeping and wailing; but he refused to believe the dismal tidings.

"But a few minutes since," cried he, "I left her alone and in health. Come with me and I will conduct you to her."

"He led the way to the tree where she had seated herself, but she was no longer there, and his pack lay on the ground. The fatal truth struck him to the heart; he fell to the ground dead!

"I give this simple story" (says Washington Irving) "almost in the words in which it was related to me, as I lay by the fire in an evening encampment on the banks of the haunted stream where it is said to have happened."

"Sympneumata"

SIR,—In order to allay the apprehensions certain to be excited in many of your readers by the above heading, as portending yet another lengthy disquisition on a subject which, if only for its abstruseness, is uncongenial to them, I will state at once that I have no intention of following "C.C.M." step by step through his elaborate critique, but shall confine myself to the very few remarks which are absolutely necessary in vindication of my position, and leave it to readers of the book itself to form their own judgment upon it and our respective estimates of it.

With the philosophy enunciated by "C.C.M." I am in no less substantial agreement on this occasion than—I am happy to say—I usually am whenever he favours us with an exposition of it, and I recognise his review of "Sympneumata" as possessing a value which—in common with the various highly accomplished students of Occultism who have signified to me their acquiescence in my estimate—I am unable to accord to the book of which it treats. The explanation which suggests itself is that—lacking extended practical experience of the class of phenomena represented by the term Sympneumata—"C.C.M." has judged the book rather by the ideas suggested to him in reading it than by what it actually is, and has accordingly transferred it from its own proper nether plane, to the transcendental level of his own thought, giving it the credit due really to himself. In my view his article would have been as appropriate had his text been an account of the ordinary "materialisation" phenomena, as to "Sympneumata"; and, indeed, given a medium of the same tone of mind, preconceived ideas, and grade of culture, as its writers, I fail to see wherein the materialisations occurring through such medium would differ from the experiences described by them. Both morally and intellectually the results would be a reflect of himself, the quality of sincerity being wanting, precisely as I find it wanting in this book, though not—as I emphatically protested—on part of the writers, whose failure is only in respect of ability to recognise the—me, palpable—false ring of the teaching received by them. Of this a salient instance—as I regard it—was cited by me as occurring on p. 159 (not 59 as printed). And that "C.C.M." should, as he avers, fail to recognise anything of the kind in any of the instances adduced, I can regard only as a striking proof of the too confiding nature of the disposition with which he approached his task. A practical experience of such a character as would enable him to compare and contrast the methods of different orders of inspiring intelligences, the higher as well as the lower, would, I am assured, have convinced him that the effects of influences proceeding from the really regenerate selfhood, could not possibly be described in the terms employed, whether as regards their exterior manifestation or the constitution of that selfhood. Neither, in such case, could a doctrine have been propounded of the intellectual order of that which gravely contemplates as a possibility the importation of evil from another planet as the explanation of its existence on this one.

On the profounder issues raised by "C.C.M." and notably the relation between spirit and matter, respecting which he offers many valuable remarks, this is neither the occasion nor the place to enter. I must be content with suggesting that were mere tenuity of constitution the condition of spirituality—and therein of purity and holiness—there could be no such entities as "evil spirits," but the phrase itself would be a contradiction.—Yours, &c.

NON-CEREBRAL INTELLIGENCE.

The fact is undeniable that all automatic, sentient, and mental manifestations in the higher animal forms are ordinarily dependent on the possession of nervous systems. These, in the lower forms of animal life, are either spread over various parts of the body, as purely automatic and unconscious nerve centres, or, are aggregated within the head or skull as cerebral centres. The former are purely automatic and unconscious; the latter are partly automatic and partly conscious and voluntary.

The apparently voluntary actions of the lower types of animal organisms are probably purely automatic, without sensation or consciousness, whilst the seemingly voluntary actions of the highest animals, including man, are partly automatic and largely conscious or voluntary. The true functions of organic life in all animals from ameba to man are entirely involuntary and automatic. Nerve or cerebral matter is not essential to what, to the ordinary observer, appears voluntary and purposive motion. The presence of nerve matter in the lowest forms of protozoa, such as ameba, has not been demonstrated and probably does not exist, and yet its motions indicate the action of what for a better term may be designated nerve force. Not only are apparently voluntary motions exhibited in the actions of purely automatic creatures, but a large proportion of the actions, and all the organic functions of man in a state of health are automatic and unconscious; such, for example, as those of the heart, the various secretions, breathing, &c. Even in the vegetable kingdom we have motions simulative of voluntary actions, viz., the inexplicable motions of diatomaceæ, the swimming spores of aquatic plants, motions of desmidiaceæ, and, as is now affirmed, bacteria, which have recently been classed among vegetables.

The special senses of man and the higher forms of lower animal beings, from man to highly differentiated infusoria, are manifestly dependent on nerves with specific functions, but in this complex, and but slightly comprehended universe, it were folly to affirm dogmatically that an organised, visible, living brain is essential to high mental manifestations.

Any man is justified in affirming that within the range of his experience a brain has always been associated with intelligence; but as man's knowledge is finite, very finite in relation to the infinite possibilities of nature, it becomes the most learned men carefully to sift any evidence of non-cerebral thought-phenomena that may be presented to them by numerous highly-trained, competent, credible, and, in all ordinary respects, reliable witnesses. Such evidence, we think, is forthcoming. Our knowledge of the functions of cerebral matter is empirical. No philosopher, apart from observation and experiment, would venture to affirm on examination of nerve matter that it was capable of sensation, volition, and thought; and all our inferences in relation to brain action are based on observation and experiment, and are, therefore, strictly empirical. The essential substances of nerves having the diverse functions of sight, hearing, smell, taste, and common sensation are microscopically and chemically alike, and yet how totally different are their functions, and how utterly impossible a priori to indicate them. Whilst admitting with the utmost frankness that all ordinarily organised material intelligences, are intelligent because of the possession of brains, we as freely and as firmly affirm that within our experience, high intelligence has been displayed in the absence and without the interposition of any ordinarily developed human brain, such acts, for example, as writing, speaking, seeing, replying to abstruse scientific and other problems, and specially writing in various languages, under conditions in which it is universally admitted that such writing is, by normal means, impossible to any ordinarily embodied human being.

It is generally accepted that writing elaborate answers to critical questions, playing complex music, producing visible and apparently living human forms out of invisible matter in a few seconds, are phenomena that cannot, according to our present knowledge, be produced by the volition of any living embodied human being, and yet such occurrences frequently take place in the presence of numerous trained observers, when embodied beings are not the producers of them, and when the beings by whom they are produced are invisible, and, being invisible, have not brains in the same sense as have the readers of this serial. Of the mode of thought by invisible intelligences we know not, any more than we know how our present brains think. The phenomena of the physics of the brain and the phenomena of mind are as much unknown to us as is the mode of thought of a spiritual being. But just as we refer ordinary human thought and mental actions to our brain, so we refer similar thought and actions manifestly produced by invisible intelligences, who do not possess material human brains, to a non-cerebral origin, or if of cerebral origin to an arrangement of nervous matter that to us is invisible, and therefore not, in a physical and commonly understood sense, cerebral matter.

Had Tyndall been as hasty in his conclusions respecting his biological researches into minute forms of life, as he has been in reference to his investigation of the phenomena of modern Spiritualism, he might, and probably would, have accepted the abiogenetic hypothesis of Bastian, rather than the biogenetic theory of Pasteur; and should he ever venture to look Spiritual facts fairly in the face, his honesty and power of observation are such that he could not resist their evidence, however reluctant he may be to be convinced.

BY EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

I have personal knowledge of only two of those who have rendered service in this department of research, Zöllner and Hellenbach. Zöllner's experiments are excellently contrived, give the best conceivable security against conjuring, show everywhere the skilled hand of an accomplished experimenter, and are reported with clearness and precision. It is to be regretted that Zöllner was intent on the confirmation of his hypothesis of a fourth dimension of real space, yet this cannot prejudice the value of the actual results obtained. But unfortunately Zöllner's reports are buried in such a wilderness of polemic, and the four volumes of his "Scientific Treatises" show in the flood of ideas so much that borders on confusion, that in his later years he can no longer be esteemed a classical witness.

Baron Hellenbach is an incisive and self-possessed man of the world (ein schlaffertiger, geistesgegenwärtiger, Weltmann) who might well be trusted to see through even astute conjuring; one, moreover, who is penetrated with a sense of the characteristic unreliability of mediums and of the worthlessness of their revelations. On the other hand, his relation to the phenomena and their significance is as little indifferent as Zöllner's; for as with the latter's fourth dimension, so he seeks in them confirmation for his metaphysical standpoint of the transcendental individuality. But what is worse, he holds it unfair (nicht für loyal) to make more use of his five senses for taking cognizance of the phenomena than the mediums or apparitions demand or permit. Now I grant that it is unfair (illoyal) to roughly clutch hold of a medium or apparition, because an alarming awakening from the somnambulist state may have injurious consequences; but I do not admit that it is unfair to supplement impressions of sight and hearing by judicious contact or by smell. I maintain rather that it is the duty of an investigator not to neglect these additional means when the apparition of a head is four or five inches in front of his own face. For either the apparition is grasped through, or a definitely constituted body, solid or fluid to the hand, is touched; in none of these cases can any harm happen to the medium. As Hellenbach does not recognise this duty, he has, in my view, admitted too favourable chances for deception to be accounted a classical witness. True, Hellenbach's reports of sittings are among the clearest and most precise we possess after those of Zöllner; but if they stood alone I should not feel sustained by them in a demand upon the Government for the appointment of a commission of investigation.

But nothing is further from the fact than that their reports stand alone. As regards the physical phenomena, they are best supplemented by the reports of Crookes and Cox, of whom the former, in his experiments with Home, first attempted to provide an exact foundation for the whole province; and the latter, in his work on psychical force, has furnished the best comprehensive report of the department of physical phenomena. Unfortunately Cox, in his observations and disquisitions, has not gone beyond this province, and Crookes, in his experiments in it with Miss Cook, has not observed that degree of critical circumspection which was to be expected of a scientific investigator, since he believed the medium to be secured by an inadequate galvanic fastening,* did not distinguish between detached forms and transfigurations, and did not take into consideration the influence of implanted hallucinations in the production of an illusory transfiguration. However, the report of the four named men are among the most instructive on the subject, and any one wishing to be informed in it cannot do better than begin with the accounts referred to.* It is to be observed that Cox is against the spirit hypothesis, that Crookes and Zöllner have declared neither for nor against it,† but have expressly limited themselves to the study of the phenomena, and that Hellenbach at least thinks very slightly of the spirit rabble which is so foolish as to occupy itself with us.

* Fastening by grasping the polar extremities, as applied by Crookes and Varley in the physical sittings with Mrs. Fay (Psychische Studien II., p. 249-358) may be considered sufficient, but not fastening to the arms with gum, as possible introduction of coins and damp blotting paper allowing the medium to come forward. (Psychische Studien, I., p. 341-349.)

The circumstance, which gives to the reports of these men a weight that standing alone they would not possess, is that in the last forty years numberless witnesses have made and published similar and surpassing observations, and that this phenomenal province is as old as the history of mankind. In China and India, among the Siberian Shamans, and the Malayan magicians, among the mystics of the Alexandrian School and in the primitive history of Christianity, in the trials for canonisation of Catholic saints and in the history of the witch-trials, among the alchemists and astrologers of the middle ages, and the vagrant thaumaturgists of the last century,—everywhere there is a recurrence of definite typical forms of abnormal powers and performances.‡ According to the ideas of the time and the situation of the mediums, they were variously ascribed to gods, nature-spirits, elementary spirits, or demons, to the power of the Holy Ghost or of the Devil, to ancestral spirits, and to a combination of nature spirits and ancestral spirits. The present Spiritism is nothing but the re-appearance and revival of a phenomenal region known to all peoples and in all times, and which has been authoritatively and vehemently denied in the Aufklärung period; the spiritistic explanation of the phenomena agrees with that of the Chinese and Indian ancestor-worship, dropping the nature-spirits and diablerie, which are no longer proper to our time.

The Aufklärung period had no respect whatever for facts; it put the world on the head (stellte die Welt auf den Kopf), that is, from the rationality of the Aufklärung it decided a priori what should and might be, and what not. At present this shallow rationalistic mode of thinking is in conflict with the re-awakened regard for reality, from which weak human reason has first to learn what is possible. The phenomena on which Spiritism founds itself have, therefore, a double interest; first, physically and psychologically, because they widen and complete our knowledge of what is actual, and therefore also possible; and second, historically, because they give us the key to the understanding, in the review of culture, of all superstition and belief in miracle, and of the natural origination of their types in conformity with law. Up to the present, modern historical research is confronted by necromancy, the flight of miracle men, saints, and witches, and by numberless other traditions of the past as by insoluble enigmas; and the hope of finding a satisfactory solution of them must of itself stimulate zeal for research in this department of phenomena, even did that not promise besides the most important elucidations of uninvestigated forces of nature and influences of one mind on another. But everything depends on this research being placed in professional hands, and, before all things, on its not being left exclusively in the hands of those who are guided by no sort of scientific interest, but only by an interest of the heart in verifying the reality of spirits.

In dealing with mediums undoubtedly one has to do with abnormal natures and phenomena, and it must be recognised that the development and employment of them are injurious to their bodily and mental health. Were the phenomena sufficiently investigated by professional authorities, this circumstance must be enough to dissuade from useless repetitions of such experiments. But as yet this province has been so little examined and elucidated that the theoretical advantage of exploring it seems greater than the injury which may result to individuals. It is, moreover, to be considered that in professional (berufenen) hands mediums will be far better taken care of than by dilettantes, because an understanding of the injurious influence of sittings leads to the humane forbearance and medical control, which up to this time mediums have not enjoyed. The phenomena with powerful mediums would be extraordinarily strengthened if they could be got to sit, not daily, but only once or twice a week; they would also keep their power longer, and their health would be much less prejudiced, perhaps not more than a good constitution could repair by nourishment. As on principle I repudiate all public exhibitions of this sort as an intolerable nuisance (Unfug), so am I equally opposed to the artificial search for mediums by private circles; I consider it sufficient to develop those mediums whose conspicuous aptitudes are spontaneously manifested. If the Government directed all authorities, magistrates, clergymen, and physicians, on every local occurrence of ghostly knockings, noises, ringing, and stone-throwing, forthwith to hunt up the unconscious medium and to send in reports, in a few years there would be sufficient material of mediums at disposal.

For a rapid survey of this province, W. Schneider's careful synopsis in his book, "The New Spirit Belief" (Der neuere Geisterglaube): Paderborn, Schöningh, 1882), may be recommended, although the entirely mediæval demonology of the Catholic author disregards the fact that the saints and holiest sons and daughters of the Church have displayed exactly the same phenomena as the witches, conjurers, and Spiritists who are presumably assisted by Satan. That the Spiritists, on account of their wicked disposition, must be actually even now punished and rooted out by the Church, as once the magicians and witches, is the good Catholic, if unexpressed, conclusion of this book of 430 pages. For a more thorough acquaintance with the subject I recommend the monthly publication, Psychische Studien, a repository of everything worth knowing in the latest phase of Spiritism. In it are to be found all the more important accounts by Zöllner and Hellenbach, as also Cox's work on Psychic Force; so that, with exception of the first foundation laid by Crookes' experiments, this periodical combines all the necessary material of fact with discussion of the different hypotheses.

The contribution of German philosophy, pro and con., has been hitherto very defective. Besides the already cited works of Hellenbach, are first to be mentioned three theistic philosophers, now deceased—J. H. Fichte, Ulrici, and Franz Hoffmann, who went over with song and trumpet (mit Sang und Klang) into the Spiritist camp, to avail themselves of the supposed Spiritist proofs of the immortality of the soul. Wundt has published a small anti-spiritist pamphlet, which does not at all enter into the discussion of the matter itself, but pronounces an à priori sentence on the problems from the standpoint of the Aufklärung. From that of Darwinism, Franz Schultze, relying on "The Confession of a Medium," and on the above-mentioned book of Schneider, has condemned the whole thing in his work, "The Fundamental Ideas of Spiritism and the Critique of them" (Die Grundgedanken des Spiritismus und die Kritik derselben): Leipzig, Gunther, 1883). Of its three essays only the first treats of modern Spiritism (pp. 3-130), and in this again only the seventh section, giving a bare extract from the "Confessions of a Medium," is noticeable, while the critique of Zöllner's reports in the eighth section is inadequate and superficial.

Among the most circumspect was the deceased disciple of Schopenhauer, Julius Frauenstadt, in his critique of Wallace's "Scientific Aspects of the Supernatural," in the Sunday Supplement of the Voss. Zgt., 1874, No. 41 et seq., Noticeable as pointing out the close relations between the older experiments and hypotheses of Reichenbach and the mediumistic phenomena is also the brochure of Leeser: "Herr Professor Wundt und der Spiritismus," 2nd Edition, Leipzig, 1879.

I am, as I have said, not in a position to pronounce upon the reality of unusual phenomena, but I consider the existing testimonies, historical and contemporary, taken in their connection, to be sufficient warrant for accepting the existence in the human organism of more forces and capacities than exact science has hitherto investigated and fathomed, and to be an adequately urgent challenge to science to enter upon the exact research of this phenomenal province. On the other hand, I hold myself at any rate competent to offer a conditional judgment on the conclusions to be drawn from these phenomena in case of their reality, for this is peculiarly the office of the philosopher, while he must leave it to the exact sciences to afford the material of fact for his conclusions and inductions. In this region, where certain hallucinations seem for the medium to be almost the indispensable condition of the occurrence of certain phenomena, and the spectators are more or less under the magnetic influence of the medium, and subject to the infection of his hallucinations, I believe it to be psychologically inevitable that judgment should be to some extent prejudiced by frequent participation in mediumistic sittings; that for the investigator, subjected by them to the power of the mediums and their hallucinations, it must be very difficult, but for the mediums themselves almost impossible, to keep the theoretical conclusions to be drawn from the phenomena independent of the falsifying impression of the hallucinations experienced, and that therefore, as regards the eventual consequences of the phenomena in question, a thinker conditionally judging from his study is more likely to be free from bias.

Philosophy is, on the whole, right to postpone conclusions till the material of exact fact is before it in a form tolerably free from doubt and uncontested; but when the representatives of exact science hesitate to undertake research in a particular province of phenomena because they are scared by inferences almost universally regarded as unavoidable by both friends and opponents of the subject, a service to the progress of knowledge may be rendered by the philosophical critic who dispels these obstructive prejudices, and thereby first opens the path to unembarrassed scientific investigation. As soon as representatives of exact science are assured that the nimbus of the supernatural, which superstition has woven about this province, is for criticism gratuitous prejudice, nothing will remain to prevent the examination of it. But with the scientific examination and natural explanation of phenomena supporting belief in miracle and superstition, they must necessarily lose the power of nourishing and fortifying such belief and superstition, which the Aufklärung has only violently and externally repressed, but has not inwardly overcome.

It would be wearisome to repeat, whenever a phenomenon is referred to, the reservation that any explanation is only conditional on the reality of the fact, and that for this reality I neither can nor will in the least vouch. I therefore beg that this protestation, here once for all expressed, may in what follows be throughout remembered. I must also observe that it would be impossible within the narrow limits of a pamphlet to make the reader exactly acquainted with the phenomena in question, for which an extensive volume would be requisite. I must, from regard to space, confine myself to founding discussion upon some typical forms of the phenomena, and as for the rest refer to the sources.

II.

THE PHYSICAL PHENOMENA.

If different persons are tested in respect to the control of their conscious wills over their involuntary muscles, very different results are obtained. No one is able wholly to suppress all involuntary muscular movements for more than a few minutes together; with normal persons, however, these involuntary movements fluctuate about a mean prescribed by the conscious will, not diverging far or long from that. With a minority of persons it is otherwise; the deviations become more considerable with time, leading at length to combined movements, very important in degree and very different in kind. If, for example, a string with weight attached is held with outstretched arm over a scale, in the case of abnormal natures, there will soon be considerable involuntary deviations of the weight from the spot fixed upon. Physiology teaches that such involuntary muscular movements do not proceed from those parts of the cortices of the large brain in which conscious will has its seat, but from middle parts of the brain; that with normal natures the reflex-prohibiting power of the large brain suffices to restrain such movements within practically insignificant limits, but that with abnormal natures the relative independence of the middle brain parts upon the supporter of the conscious will can attain a considerable degree.

Since the activity of these middle brain parts has usually only a preparatory or executive value, and, therefore, as a rule, for the human self-consciousness remains unconscious, we have here to do with a relatively unconscious activity of the brain, the results of which are expressed by involuntary muscular movements. In so far also as memory, intelligence, and desires accede to these middle brain parts, the results of the involuntary muscular activity produced by the latter might very well appear to emanate from an intelligent and characterised personality, notwithstanding that the waking self-consciousness of the person performing these movements knew nothing of its unconscious brain activity causing the same. Nay, such person need not even be sensible of his involuntary muscular activity, and may thus, with a good conscience, deny his mental origination and bodily mediation of the phenomena occurring, while yet he is the sole cause of them. This theory of involuntary muscular activity and unconscious brain activity was first started and expounded by the English physiologist Carpenter,* and may now be considered as fairly recognised. Carpenter has only committed the mistake of holding his theory to be an exhaustive explanation of all mediumistic phenomena, and of discreditably (in illoyaler Weise) attacking the investigators who, like Crookes, dispute this pretension.

If several persons sit in the dark, in tense expectation, with hands on a table, frequently one or other of them is an abnormal nature, in the sense that after some time he develops involuntary muscular action, and moves the table, although he can swear that he has not willed to move it, and has detected no involuntary motion of his arms and hands. To find out who the person is, it is only necessary to address the table, proposing that it should signify "no" by one rap, "doubtful" by two, and "yes" by three raps. If the table agrees by three raps, it is next to be asked whether A, or B, or C, is the medium, till instead of the negative one gets the affirmative reply by the raps. It should then further be asked whether the arrangement of the circle is favourable for phenomena, or should be altered in order to free the medium from disturbing influences, or if any one should be excluded as a disturbing element. In the answers are reflected the unconscious antipathies and sympathies of the medium towards the rest of the party, and after obedience to these indications the phenomena will become much more distinct. One can then proceed to get the alphabet rapped off, the numeral order of a letter in the alphabet being signified by the number of raps, and thus, by a very detailed process, it is true, carry on conversation with the unconsciously functioning brain of the medium.

The conversation is expedited by application of involuntary arm or hand movements to the designation of the letters, as by suspending a weight attached to a string over an alphabet,* or of involuntary pressure of the hand upon a pointer revolving upon an alphabetical plate, or upon the latter revolving under a stationary pointer. In each case the unconsciously functioning parts of the medium's brain must be first used to the conditions, many mistakes with the letters, requiring great patience for rectification, being made before this practice is acquired.

Still quicker than with such so-called "psychographs" or "Spiritoscopes" is the conversation when the medium writes directly with pen or pencil. This involuntary writing is abundantly proved in the case of the insane; when it occurs with the sane they are called "writing mediums." They can often only get the involuntary writing with the left hand, and then it is usually reversed (Spiegelschrift). Many involuntary writers reverse even with the right hand. With most the involuntary handwriting differs in character from their ordinary writing, and often resembles that of those from whom the communication purports to come. Involuntary writing often occurs in full consciousness, in the middle of a cheerful conversation, and apparently as mechanically and heedlessly as an idle play of the fingers. For conversation it is less adapted than raps or the psychograph, because it prefers to follow its own caprices and dreamy courses, and allows the widest facility for intentional deceptions.

With involuntary writing is here to be mentioned involuntary speaking, which however usually occurs in waking unconsciousness, thus in a state of convulsion or ecstasy (trance). In this way are recited speeches and poems, learnt by rote, as also independent lectures and sermons, mostly on religious or other ideal subjects of emotional interest. The "speaking with tongues" of the early Christian communities is only to be understood as involuntary speech in a religiously motivated ecstasy. Here the muscles of speech, as in writing those of the hand, are innervated by involuntary brain activity of the middle central organs, and as with the change of handwriting, so here the voice takes an altered ring and intonation, resembling that of a particular person, if the medium has the illusion that this person is speaking through him.

In the case of speaking mediums, it is quite clear that one has to do with a somnambulic state,† conditioned by psychical excitement; with writing mediums an externally insensitive trance-condition without waking consciousness can exist during the writing, yet the waking consciousness

* Entirely similar to the motions of such a string, is, in its origin, the motion of the divining rod, only that the latter is not used to point out letters, but for manifestation of sensitive impressions of the lower nerve centres, especially of the obscure feelings excited in sensitives by the proximity of water or metals. The problem of the divining rod, which plays so important a part in well-seeking and treasure-digging, is already solved in principle (end gültig) by Reichenbach in his work, "Sensitive Man" ("Der sensitive Mensch").

† Compare my essay: "Somnambulism" ("Nord und Süd," 1885), which forms the supplement to this treatise.

* The author's references are to Psychische Studien; but the English reader may be referred to the original work, "Mental Physiology."—TR.

can persist apparently undisturbed, engaging in cheerful discourse, while the unconscious activity of the middle parts of the brain simultaneously effects the involuntary writing. Now there are here two possible cases; either the unconscious brain activity in question is an absolutely unconscious, purely material process, following prescribed mechanical paths, and only presenting in its results the semblance of conscious intelligence, in consequence of the mechanical paths pursued having been formerly levelled and prescribed by relatively conscious psychical activity, or with and behind the waking consciousness there is a somnambulant consciousness accompanying these mechanical material brain processes and enlightening them with real intelligence.

If the involuntary writing only repeated what had been learnt by rote, or put together fragments of memory in an accidental unintelligent manner, the first side of the alternative would be sufficient, and as the simpler would be preferable. But as in these productions the government of a productive phantasy and of a regulating intelligence is, up to a certain degree, unmistakable, the decision must be for the co-existence of two consciousnesses in different parts of the brain. This phenomenon must therefore be called somnambulism, but somnambulism masked, that is veiled and made unrecognisable for external observation, by the persistence of the waking consciousness. This masked somnambulism is to be considered as a transition state between the single dominion of the waking consciousness and that of the somnambulant consciousness, and can pass through the most different degrees as regards the relative clearness of the two consciousnesses; these steps leading successively from the first emergence of the somnambulant consciousness above the threshold, when the waking consciousness is still apparently unchanged, through half-dreamy states of impaired circumspection and accountability (as in second sight), up to complete extinction of the sensibility of the waking consciousness.*

What till now, with Carpenter, we have called unconscious cerebration, we could thus just as well name the activity of somnambulant consciousness, and assert that the involuntary muscular movements of mediums, in so far as by their results they discover a co-operating intelligence, are occasioned and guided by activity of somnambulant consciousness, whether this latter, by extinction of the waking consciousness, is apparent to by-standers, or whether it is masked by the persistence of the waking consciousness. By a medium we shall have to understand an individual who either casually or by self-induced psychical excitation, falls spontaneously into manifest or masked somnambulism. Mediums are usually in manifest somnambulism: first, in the involuntary speaking; secondly, at the production of physical phenomena, which require an extraordinary exertion of nerve force; and thirdly, for the implantation of hallucinations in the spectators, for which a special intensity of the hallucinations in the medium himself seems to be a condition precedent. Most of the other phenomena happen in the condition of a masked somnambulism, and it is just this condition which most easily induces deceptions as to the causes of the phenomena, as well in the spectators who are unacquainted with it, as in the medium himself. The understanding of masked somnambulism is, therefore, the key to the whole province of mediumistic phenomena.

It is further characteristic of mediums that they are auto-somnambules; that is, that without the influence of a magnetiser and without mechanical aids, thus by merely psychical aids, they place themselves in masked or manifest somnambulism.

* This masked somnambulism plays a part in seers and mystics not yet sufficiently observed and examined. As the effectiveness (virtuosity) of second-sight or mystic intuition develops, the necessity there at first was, that the normal consciousness should be extinguished to make way for the ecstatic condition, dimmishness; and from a certain degree of effectiveness onwards, the seer and mystic can so command the ecstatic vision that it co-exists and is interchangeable with normal consciousness. With Andrew Jackson Davis, for example, the periods of open and masked somnambulism can be traced as successive sections of his life.

bulism. It is just this self-disposing to somnambulism when desired which requires considerable practice before it can be commanded with some confidence at the wish of strangers; it also very easily refuses, the sittings being then failures. The investigations of Fahnestock have shown that every one has the latent capacity for voluntary auto-somnambulism by merely psychical means, and that many persons by practice can come to effect this transition at any time with tolerable rapidity. They have shown further, that one can awake from this condition by mere force of will, but also that this waking can be voluntarily accomplished with restriction to certain parts of the body (as the head alone, or the upper part of the body alone, or only the head and half the body), and even that the whole body, with exception of a single limb, can be awakened from the somnambulant state.*

The effect in such cases is that the waking consciousness resumes its functions and its conscious will resumes control over the awakened parts of the body, but that the parts not yet awakened are still withdrawn from that control, and remain exclusively subject to the somnambulant consciousness, and in the absence of any impulse from the somnambulant parts of the brain appear cataleptic. This remarkable phenomenon of locally confined, or locally removed, hypnotism is confirmed by the latest French researches in somnambulism. According to Fahnestock, practice at length enables the direct withdrawal of particular parts of the body from the conscious will and sensibility, and their subjection to a condition in itself cataleptic, but in fact sensitive and compliant to every innervation-impulse of the somnambulant consciousness. In this condition, which makes itself known by a fall in the temperature of the skin in the limb affected, there is no longer any accord between the innervation-impulses of the somnambulant parts of the brain and the reflex-prohibitions and voluntary acts of the waking consciousness, so that the limb in question is subject alone and exclusively to the somnambulant impulses.

This condition of local catalepsy for waking consciousness can the more easily occur, when there is besides a general condition of masked somnambulism, with which Fahnestock is unacquainted; such local catalepsy and insensibility must, however, completely deceive the medium himself into the belief that the acts performed by him with this limb, by reason of the somnambulant innervation-impulse, are not his at all. It is a constantly recurring observation, that the hand of a medium, which by means of still uninvestigated nerve forces produces extraordinary phenomena (as writing at a distance without contact with the pencil), is cold, it being a rule that the fall of temperature immediately precedes the phenomena. (Ps. St. XI. 498.)† In some very extraordinary phenomena, e.g., the penetration of the medium's arm by an iron ring, it is reported that the medium's hands become as cold as those of a corpse laid upon ice. (Ps. St. III. 55.)

Here, however, the passing of a limb into the cataleptic or hypnotic state is to be regarded as a phenomenon not conditioned by the will, but involuntarily brought about, with reference to the aim of the somnambulant consciousness. Waking consciousness and its conscious will only give, first, the impulse to the medium to place himself in masked or manifest somnambulism, and secondly the general directive, what sort of phenomenon is wished for and expected; the somnambulant consciousness set going may take cognizance of these wishes and directions up to a certain point, often,

† [In confirmation the translator may refer to his own report in "LIGHT," April 19th, 1884. "We (Mr. Roelen Noel and myself) noticed two facts (always observed likewise with Slade), one of which, certainly, could not result from any voluntary act of the medium. This was the lowering of the temperature of the hand which held the slate just before and after the writing. The other fact was the cessation of the sound of writing when Mr. Eglington broke the contact of his hand with my own."—Tr.]

however, not at all, and even when it has regard to them, the result is usually somewhat different from that expected, generally falling short of the latter, but sometimes exceeding it. How the somnambulant consciousness of the medium begins to carry into execution the design, which with or without regard to the wishes of the waking consciousness it sets, that is, how it obtains mastery over the involuntary muscular activity and the still uninvestigated forces of the organism, we as yet know just as little, as how the conscious will begins to obtain mastery over the voluntary muscular movements and animal magnetism. It is certain that here also practice has great influence, but again that with wholly inexperienced mediums the most astonishing phenomena can involuntarily occur, of the connection of which with themselves the mediums have no suspicion whatever.

An universal medium must be more than an auto-somnambulant; he must be at the same time a powerful magnetiser. There are strong magnetisers who have no tendency to somnambulism, and such are not to be called mediums, because their somnambulant consciousness is never so far liberated from their conscious wills as to arrive at the production of mediumistic results. Their operations are limited to magnetising other persons, either locally or totally, and in the latter case making somnambules of them; but it is a question whether the conscious will may not be trained to direct its magnetic force to other than living objects, and thus succeed in the conscious voluntary production of some at least of the mediumistic phenomena. There is here, of course, no question of the involuntary muscular effects hitherto occupying us, but of another province of physical phenomena, the experimental conditions of which must be so arranged as indubitably to exclude the co-operation of involuntary muscular action.

HEALING BY FAITH; OR, PRIMITIVE MIND CURE. By W. F. EVANS. London: Reeves and Turner, 3s. 6d. May be obtained of the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross, W.C.

This work treats of the cure of disease in ourselves and others by mental and spiritual agencies. The method of cure here discussed prevails extensively in Boston and elsewhere in America, and with a success which cannot be gainsaid. The rooms of some of the practitioners in Boston remind one of the ante-room of a successful London physician in the number of patients to be seen waiting for their turn; and whatever the true explanation of the facts may be, most of the bodily ailments which flesh is heir to are cured, and that, too, by people some of whom know as little of science or philosophy as a child, but yet, possessing the single-mindedness and implicit trust of the child, achieve the wonders accorded to faith.

And on what theory does the writer of this work, do indeed all the practitioners, proceed? It is that of an all-pervading, all-powerful, all-beneficent Mind. They have no other explanation; the facts to them admit of no other.

Thought, says the Kabala, is the source of all that is. The first expressions of thought are ideas, which in their relation to external nature are thus defined by Proclus: "They are the exemplary causes of things which perpetually subsist according to nature." All creation is first in idea; and if a man would be perfectly well in body, he must first form the true idea of himself, such as he really is in spirit.

When a man forms a conception of his real and immortal self this acts as a cause, and tends to adjust the lower animal soul and the body in harmony with it. Ideas, however, are but imperfectly expressed in the deceptive and illusory world of sense. The objects of nature are not truly existing things; they are only in a state of becoming, they exhibit an effort to realise the ideal plan of their being. This is why disease and imperfection exist.

This philosophy of idealism is to be applied to the cure of disease as it was by Jesus, the Christ. All disease, so far as it has a material or bodily expression, must have had a pre-existence in us as a fixed mode of thought. This must be expunged if we would cure the malady. But how? The author finds the answer in the New Testament doctrine of faith. When properly understood we see why, as Jesus declared, it is ever unto us according to our faith. Faith is the power of perceiving spiritual realities that lie above and beyond the range of the senses, and a confidence in those higher truths; and the sublimest truth of faith is that in our inmost being we are one with the Divine nature. To discover our real self and to find it included in the being of the manifested God, the Christ, is the summit of all spiritual knowledge. Not the Christ of the popular theology, where the idea shrinks and dwindles down to an isolated personality, but a larger, fuller, diviner Christ, an eternal, all-pervading, all-containing, and universal Christ. In that Divine realm of our being there is no disease, nor sorrow. That realm is within, and when we turn the mind inwards upon itself in the direction of our real life and true being, then all the false things of time are left without the gate, sundered from our real self.

It is in the animal soul, in what the Apostle Paul denominates the psychical man, which is badly translated "the natural man," that the source of disease is to be looked for. It exists there in a false opinion, in a fear, an anxiety, or some other misguided feeling. This reference to the animal soul leads to a consideration of the nature of man. Man is capable of living and acting on either of three distinct planes of being. But by this trinity the author means three degrees of our immortal nature, for in this life there are two others, the external body and the astral body, both of which are dissolved by death. The lowest degree of our immortal nature is called the animal soul, the psyche of the New Testament, and the nephesh of the Hebrews. To this region of the mind belongs opinion, or the reception of the beliefs of others. Here also is what we call reason. The animal soul is the basement story of our immaterial, intellectual nature. It is the region in us of the evil and the false, of sin and disease; and we must acquire the power of transferring our consciousness to a more internal plane of being.

The next degree is where the mind rises above the darkness and fallacies of the senses, and thinks and acts on the plane of pure intellect. It is the region of spiritual intelligence. It has been called the rational soul, but is more properly designated the intellectual soul, for reason belongs to the psychical man, and never discovers truth. In the intellectual soul things are perceived in idea. There man is no longer blinded by the external senses, but the faculties act independent of organic instruments. This higher story or plane of man's being is the seat of faith, which is the perception of truth lying above the range of the senses.

The pneuma, or spirit, is the supreme degree of the mind or thinking principle, the angelic and divine man. From this inmost depth of His conscious life Jesus, speaking for all men, said, "I and My Father are one"; and again, "The Father is in Me, and I am in the Father." It is the Buddhi of the Sanscrit, the inward Christ of Paul; and its development in us, from its latent state into consciousness, is eternal life.

It is an all-important point gained towards the attainment of a mental power to cure disease when we come to a clear perception of the truth that man is already a spirit, and not merely some time to become one. This is the true idea of man, and steadfastly maintained will translate itself into an expression upon every plane of man's being.

The author refers to Swedenborg to show how a change in our mode of thought reaches the body. In the degrees of life one form is more interior than another, but one exists and subsists from another. An idea takes form in the intellectual soul, and this latter moulds the animal soul into its expression, and through this it passes into the physical organism. It is a deep law of our being that all ideas have an inherent tendency to actualise or externalise themselves in the corporeal organism. In the chapter entitled, "Executing Judgment upon Ourselves; or, in Thought Separating Disease from the Real Self," the author describes what we are to do in curing ourselves of disease. We are to separate, in thought, our inner self, the immortal Divine Ego, from the disease, placing the madly outside our real being, and viewing it as no part of ourselves, but as something foreign to us. Speaking of a disease or a tumour, the author says, "If I thus disown it as a part of myself, and cease to think of it as included in the contents of the Ego, it will derive no support from my inner being, and will disappear as certainly as a branch severed from a tree will wither and die of itself. So a disease upon which I sit in judgment, from the throne of the Divine spirit in me, or which I separate from my conscious inner self, and utterly disown as a part of myself, will be not only like a house built upon the sand, but like a castle in the air, a building that has no foundation. We make disease a part of ourselves only by thinking it such, and thus we give it vitality."

To maintain with a volitional obstinacy this attitude of thought towards a disease will have a marvellous power in curing it. "If we steadfastly hold in mind the true idea of ourselves, it will form the soul, and through that the body, into its outward expression, just as certainly as in a stormy day, when the clouds are dispersed, the sun will shine. The error, the illusion that I am sick, or in pain, or any discomfort, that my real and inner self is diseased or unhappy, is that alone which forms a cloud between me and the sun of a higher sky, whence all life emanates. When that veil is removed, the Sun of Righteousness with its living light will arise on my interior world with healing on its wings."

The treatment of disease in others rests on the same principles as are to be applied for the cure of ourselves. We have to remove from the mind of the patient the morbid idea, and to help to form in it the true. The disease must be separated in thought from the real being, it must be disowned. To do this we must speak to the patient in thought. One advantage of this is that we are met by no opposition of will, no tendency to question and raise objections. When we speak to a patient in thought and in silent prayer, we touch the hidden spring of his life if he is in a condition of receptivity. Prayer is the most intense form of the action or influence of our mind upon another. It expresses the highest activity of the will, faith and imagination, in an act of benediction. Discussing the nature and right use of the will, the author says that the highest conception of an act of the will is that it is an inward Divine impulse towards a good end or aim. The will is the innermost root of our life, and forever flows forth from the Divinity within us. This is also true of faith. The imagination is also, when used in distinction from the fancy, a Divine spiritual power, and, as a mode of thought, is one of the most subtle and potent forces in the universe. The fancy belongs to the psychical or animal-soul region, which is the region of illusion and sensuous fallacies. But thought is a manifestation of God. It is a power that arises perpetually out of the one life, and is never sundered from it. The will, the faith, the imagination are the highest powers of the human mind, they are an activity of the Divine realm of our being. Behind every virtuous and beneficent exercise of will so defined, there lie the life and tranquil omnipotence of the Deity.

Every virtuous resolution, says Fichte, influences the Omnipotent Will (or Life), not in consequence of a momentary approval, but of an everlasting law of his Being.

It is to be observed, says the author, that the will belongs to the Universal Life-Principle. It is not an active, but a passive or re-active potency. It is included in the department of the love or feeling, and in its highest form is the Chokma or Sophia of the Kabala, which in its correlations or descending degrees becomes the living force of the world. Thought or intelligence is the active or masculine potency, and the will the passive and feminine power. Thought speaks and the will responds. The true form of the action in a curative effort is not put forth as a command, but as a positive affirmation. In the first chapter of Genesis we have a sublime exhibition of the omnipotent creative Thought, going forth as Will. It is not as in the common translation, "Let there be light, and there was light," but God said (or thought) "Light is, and light was." It is only thought formulating itself in a positive affirmation. It seems hardly necessary to remark that a strong will-force makes no more exertion in a silent curative effort, directed to ourselves or others, than the mind makes in believing or affirming that two and two are four. Labouring effort is not will but the lack of it. All the volition that is necessary is that of a wish or benevolent desire expressing itself in an affirmation. Desire alone is powerless; and thought alone is lifeless and inefficient. In every genuine act of faith there is a union of thought and emotion, or an intellectual conception and a feeling that it is true. This is what makes it the "word of power."

The above is a very imperfect outline, in the author's own words, of a most interesting work. The book is an important contribution to the highest philosophy. There are many chapters to which no reference has been made, but which are full of teaching of the greatest value. The author is evidently a man of very wide reading, and of an illuminated mind; and he has had a twenty years' experience of the subject of which he treats. In the chapter headed "The Relation of Jesus to the Christ and to Man," he makes a confession of his own faith in the following striking passage: "In the formula fidei, or condensed expression of faith of Buddhism, which is called Trisharana, or 'the three refuges,' it is said, 'I take my refuge in Buddha, Dharma, and Sangha.' By Dharma is meant the doctrines, teachings, and precepts of Gautama. Sangha signifies the assemblies and ritualistic observances of the Church. After a careful study, pursued without prejudice, of the system of Buddhism, both in its theoretical and practical aspects, while acknowledging in it much that is divinely true and identical with Christianity, I am still constrained to say, 'I take my refuge in Jesus the Christ.' In every age of the world God has raised up extraordinary men, and imparted to them a high degree of light from the living Word. Such were Moses, Zoroaster, Confucius, Plato, and, above all, Gautama, the Buddha. There was many a stray beam of the living light of the Logos in all their systems, but it does not come in a form to be easily and practically appropriated by the souls of men in general. And if Jesus should say to me, as He did to the twelve select disciples, when many of His shallow followers were leaving Him, 'Will you also go away?' I should be constrained to say, as all the world's great teachers passed in procession before the mind, 'Lord, to whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life.'"

THE MISSING LINK IN MODERN SPIRITUALISM. By A. Leat Underhill, of the Fox Family. Manchester: Dr. William Britten, The Limes, Humphrey-street, Cheetham-hill. Price 9s. 6d., post free.

"The Rochester Knockings"—the starting-point of the movement now known all over the civilised world as modern Spiritualism—have been often recorded and described, more or less accurately, by eye-witnesses and others who were concerned in them. Never before, however, has such a complete narrative been presented to the world as is found in this volume. It is well, for the sake of historical accuracy alone, that Mrs. Underhill, the eldest of the three "Fox girls," and consequently one of the chief actors in those strange and mysterious events, should at last have complied with the request repeatedly made for the publication of the documentary and other evidence in her possession. Her narrative is of real interest for Spiritualists at large, though at times the story of these early days is a sad and regretful one. Pioneers are ever martyrs, and there was no exception in the case of these girls. Theirs was a strange life and experience, as indeed is that of most mediums. Feted and feasted one day, hounded and hooted through the streets the next—it is a matter for wonder that the effect upon mere children, as they were, was not most disastrous. A perusal of this book will do much good. It will reveal the fact that the first essential of successful investigation is a kindly sympathy with our mediums, and that such a frame of mind is no barrier to careful and searching inquiry. In some quarters, now-a-days, that fact is too much lost sight of. We intend to give an extended review of the work when opportunity serves. This, we hope, will shortly occur. In the meantime we cordially recommend it to the notice of our readers, as a valuable and interesting addition to the history of Spiritualism. The book is enriched by numerous steel-plate portraits and engravings.

*NOTTINGHAM.—Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond has been visiting this town and has delivered discourses in Morley House. The Spiritualists usually meeting there kindly invited Mrs. Richmond to use their room, an offer which her committee gladly accepted. On Thursday, August 13th, the subject for the discourse was chosen by the audience, and was of a popular nature. On Sundays, August 9th and 16th, the "guides" spoke to large audiences, including a number of friends not identified with Spiritualism, and many were the remarks of deep appreciation which were heard on leaving the room. Many questions were asked in writing, and the answers seemed to give general satisfaction.—Con.

THE MAGNETISM OF EVIL.

The aura, or magnetism of an evil action, hangs about the place where it was committed for an indefinite period, affecting individuals who may be in a condition to receive it, with a desire to repeat the action, or commit some similar crime. It is an astral poison, given out by a perverted Will, and is as tangible, as powerful, and irresistible, as any Od force or magnetism of an opposite character. As bodies which have lost the equilibrium of health succumb to malarial disease, so do minds, or souls, unbalanced, more or less insane or obsessed, fall under the influence of the moral malaria, whose force has been intensified in some particular locality by the perpetration of an evil action. Proofs of this fact are continually cropping up in society, which is devastated at certain periods by epidemics of crime, as well as of disease. At this moment Highgate Archway is the scene of a suicidal epidemic, the fifth suicide within the year having occurred upon that spot a short time ago.

The perpetration of suicide in a room endows that room with a sort of spell, beneath which fall the morally weak, until, by some happy concatenation of circumstances, the spell is broken. If a man hurl himself from the parapet of a bridge, it is sure to be followed by a series of actions of the same sort within a short period of each other. It is the same with other crimes, and even less evils of life, which permeate the astral light with a contagion against which only wills positive in good are proof.

There seems an impelling, irresistible force at work which those who are already unbalanced, perhaps unconsciously so, are unable to withstand. This force, coming at times with the strength of a personal impetus, frequently takes astral shape to the inner eye; and if the poor victims have ever afterwards the power of describing their sensations at the time of the commission of crime, they generally say "the devil made them do it!" It is indeed that power which alone deserves the name of "devil"—the "Magnetism of Evil"; that blind force which men must learn to conquer if they would liberate themselves from the thralls of earth and the flesh, for if the Human Will does not learn to detach itself from that fatal magnetism, it will become swallowed up and absorbed in the current which ends in ruin, and at the end of life, when too late, it may be awakened to gaze horror-stricken into the abyss of its own destruction.

This Odic, or magnetic current, is formed by a chain of perverted Human Wills; it is in fact an "Evil," or the "Evil Spirit," and becomes in very truth an objectified personality for certain minds. It is this force—which the Gospels call "Legion,"—which precipitated the swine into the sea, by command of One in Whom dwelt the God-like power of mastering it; legions of forces or "elementals," which had attained certain diabolical shapes from brooding in the human perversions which afforded them a home, and gave to them power, being, substance, of a certain attenuation, that is, substance invisible to the grosser sight.

This allegory is a representation of the manner in which persons of low instincts are dragged to destruction, when once they enter within the Odic current of blind forces, which may have been set in motion by even one perverted Will,—by its error—its sin. Like the avalanche toppling from the mountain heights, nothing can stay the downward impulse, which gathers momentum as it goes, and drags down everything in its way; or like a herd filled with brutish instincts,—even if in human forms,—swayed by some insane passion, linked together in a deadly chain of evil intentions, like one vast body moved by one monstrous will, which dashes unreasoning into a whirlpool of destruction.

It is from the contagion of evil magnetisms permeating the astral light, which frequently operates by secret thought alone, that a certain evil of life will sometimes overspread the social fabric like a mantle of moral rottenness; altering the mental complexion from spiritual fairness to gross material blackness, and transforming the inner man, who should be of proportions god-like, and of beauty angelic, into a "devil" of hideous deformity and ugliness, whose aura is a baleful poison, and who can only inspire disgust and horror. When the tenebrous illusions of the astral earth-born fog rise from minds in this condition, and gradually spread from mind to mind on the same level, but never touch those who live upon the mountain heights of spiritual wisdom, where the air is pure, it becomes at length impossible to perceive what is fair and good; the dark and evil become alone possible, and man is then insane—a devil. Good seems to him a folly, the false dream of fools; and he alone is wise according to nature and her laws, which he perverts, and reads the wrong way. Hence he becomes the enemy of God, man, and nature; he preys upon his kind with the insatiate voracity of a demon, poisons himself, and at length is overwhelmed in the vortex of destruction.

The horrible diseases which afflict the body, and which originate in the astral light,—for material excesses alter the organisation of the astral or sidereal body, and the physical body suffers, in its turn, from the failures of the soul, let them be great or small—present in some degree the outward similitude of the ravaging horrors which infest human souls, and which they contract from each other, thereby helping to spread the infection of evil. The pent-up forces which find their way through the earth's crust in the form of explosions, volcanic disturbances, and earthquakes, correspond to the moral convulsions which break up society, root and branch; hurling helpless innocent myriads beneath the rampant demoniac wills of insane revolutionists, despoilers, and murderers; leaving the ruins of fair homes, and minds stunned and paralysed by fright and horror. These convulsions have their origin in some secret evil which is hidden over and concealed, until by propagation from mind to mind, it gains an enormous explosive power which it is impossible to control, and which, ere long, hurls ruin upon all sides. This is because of the rottenness of society, which seeks enjoyment, and only enjoyment, beneath the reign of the insatiate "Mother of Desire"—Lust in its multifarious forms,—for money, for power, for fame, for applause, for animal pleasures, &c., &c.

The only way to overcome the "Magnetism of Evil" is by opposing to it the "Magnetism of Good." Since evil exists from the perversion of man's will, it is necessary that his will should be reconstituted and rehabilitated in good. Then should we see "Satan fall like lightning from Heaven," the Heaven of the regenerated, redeemed mind. "The Kingdom of Heaven is within you," said the Lord Jesus: nor is Heaven an objective locality; it is the home of each spirit, formed in the purity of its own thought-world—the outcome of the Divine inner self, which is evolved through purifying sufferings, by which it becomes One with God, and thus alone becomes entitled to be called "a spirit," having been before only animal-human, with a human soul unspiritualised.

Each man by making himself pure can help to make the world pure; by learning of good, can teach it, and help to spread it, and thus save more and more of the human family. The Divine ones who become "one with God," who have perceived within themselves the birth of the Spirit, or who feel, and thrill to its Divine overshadowing, have need to come out, perhaps more than ever, in the strength and might of a regenerated Will to fight against some of the evils of life which are ravaging and undermining the healthy constitution of human society. We need troops and armies of "Sir Galahads" to set forth in quest of that "Holy Grail" of a pure life, which can alone prove we retain "God with us," and from whose holy fulness may be poured streams of saving grace for myriads of the infected, diseased, and starving. From such a white-robed army of the Sons of Faith, a powerful current of good magnetism would flow with beneficent healing power through the astral atmospheres, reviving with a supermural strength souls now fainting in the mephitic exhalations from surrounding diseased minds.

To attain to the knowledge of spirituality and truth entails the duty to teach it, to spread it. No man should hide his light under a bushel, but, setting it on high, suffer it to radiate through the darkness as far as it can reach. By speech, by writings, by example, those who possess truth, which is the knowledge of good, have the means of pouring forth, each one, a stream of good magnetism, which must, sooner or later, find affinities subjects, and thus extend the good. A powerful chain is thus formed for an Odic current opposed to the "Magnetism of Evil." It is an endless fight between the "Angels of Light" and the "Angels of Darkness," and the victory is ever to the side which gains the greatest number of adherents. All the more needful then is it for the Sons of Faith, or the Enlightened, to be earnest in teaching. The greater the number of those who lead lives of grace, from a knowledge of what is best for the soul, and a reformed Will which determines to live that best, the greater will become the force of moral suasion over the children of the world, who seek only transitory enjoyment in sensual pleasures, to whom life is nought but the gratification of desire. A sort of universal education is thus finally set up,—a certain standard becomes "the fashion," and no man or woman can be considered comme il faut who does not conform to what then becomes the fiat of good society, in the way of morals, thought, and life. Society thus becomes its own regenerator, its own saviour, acting out the inspirations it has put itself in the way of receiving from the highest sources, by turning its Will to good instead of to evil.

The best means to this end is to teach children, and the ignorant, the power of the human Will; that it is the determining element under all circumstances for, or against; and danger alone lies in its weakness, its passivity, its negativity. "He who listens is lost"; he who vacillates, or hesitates when it is a question of right or wrong; he who tampers, or would wear two faces, is also equally lost. The Will cannot be too strong, too positive in good; it is the loose, negative, lukewarm, divided Will which permits the extension of evil, thus forming the rotten link in the chain by which the current of good is broken, and evil enters in its place. Activity of Will is the one essential motive-power of human existence: makes it active in good, and for good alone, and the individual is set on the right road, and will continue to evolve untold benefits to himself and others so long as the Will continues to be exercised in good. But if he be negative, indifferent, lukewarm; he becomes a dolt, a fool, a lump of inanity, and is only fit to be spewed out of the mouth. He is just as likely to soak up, like a sponge, filthy water as pure, and if he soaks up the one, he is only fit to be cast out.

The Will is the armour of Faith, by which Faith may perform miracles. Belief and Will should form one; apart they accomplish nothing. Peter hesitated on the waves, and began to sink; his Master reproached him with a want of faith, because his faith and will were divided from an infirmity of will; the same infirmity made him deny his Lord.

Those who commit crimes are insane; they possess perverted Wills, or Wills weakened from misuse, and they are powerless to resist the force of evil. Teach a child from its infancy to oppose evil with a determined Will, and we shall not find it sink beneath temptation, which is the fate of the weak and vacillating. It happens that the Human Will never receives training; it is left to a chance growth, and is powerfully or weakly exercised as the individual may be of a positive or negative nature. A strong-willed man is usually a stubborn man, in whom the Will becomes too frequently asinine, stupidly intent upon what concerns self alone; unreasoning, but determined to have its own way. When united with courage a stubborn Will is a useful characteristic, especially if its object by chance be a good one; but it is oftener than not the fruitful source of misery to hundreds, and may be the cause of widespread calamity.

There is nothing comparable to the power of the Human Will; by it, forces may be set in motion which would overwhelm the world; and by its exercise in beneficence, the whole human race may be uplifted into the health and beauty of heavenliness, and a new race of Divine men come at length to people the earth, men incapable of evil because desiring and Willing only good. From the lives these would lead of co-operation with God in nature's laws for the good of the whole, the earth would become a heavenly condition of existence; selfishness would be extinguished, for each man would live for the good of the whole of mankind; the astral light would become purified, and clear, from the regenerated will-forces brought to bear upon it, in altered and improved thought, mental impulse, and decision; disease would become an impossibility, and every force in nature would be held in a Divine equilibrium from human harmony of Will to produce only good.

Such a state of society is not an impossibility. The good on the earth already produce it partially; it extends around them so far as the perverted Wills of others will permit. It is the perversion of Will which liberates the chaotic, destructive forces, and causes the disorders, malaria, moral and physical, crime, sufferings, and wretchedness of humanity.

The man who begins to reform himself begins to change his magnetism from evil to good. The purer he becomes in will, thought, and life, the less vitiated will be the Od force, or astral fluid, or magnetism, he gives out, which is the invisible but most potent emanation of the astral, or inner man—the soul—which thus radiates forth its intangible substances, as the outer vehicle or casing of flesh emits breath, heat, perspiration, odour, exhalations &c The inner man is perfectly a man: he is the astral, or psychical man, and may, if he wills, be animated by Divine spirit; but if he wills the contrary, he makes himself a devil—the opposite to God. It is the inner or astral man who does all the willing and thinking; it is he who puts forth all the power for good or evil on the earth. From him flows, through his material covering, that wonderful Od force, or astral fluid, which may be poison or health to his neighbours, exactly according to the habits of thought and impulses of Will which infuse wholesomeness or disease into the magnetism. It is he who may, demon-like, contaminate other minds, giving forth that powerful current of delusion, of perversion, which may entangle minds incapable of reasoning; luring them by the fascinations of the senses, and dragging them to destruction. It is he who diseases his own body from exercising a vitiated or infirm Will, thereby setting up contagion in society. It is he who, by yielding to the lower bestial principles which he should resist and conquer, breeds, nay creates, new, horrible diseases, which at length devastate the whole of mankind. The perverted astral man, the deformed, diseased soul, is a "devil," from whom proceeds the "Magnetism of Evil."

Had this power not gained so great a strength amongst us, we should have none of those mad crimes committed, whose tragic horrors culminate in the execution of the criminal. Society would not so frequently stand aghast at the appalling revelations of vicious propensities prevailing in its lower strata, which, like volcanic perturbations, threaten to burst upwards in some overwhelming catastrophe; nor would society find itself turned into a species of Lazaretto, wherein, on the one side, means are employed to mitigate a moral leprosy, from which, on the other side, through the infatuation of insane passion, contamination is sought and perpetuated. We should have no inebriates, no lunatics, no minds suffering under religious or any other delusions, driving them to commit suicide; nor would any harmless structure, like Highgate Archway, designed for comfort, convenience, or ornament, become transformed into a spot dangerous to afflicted lunatics from the spell put upon it by the "Magnetism of Evil."

WHAT MIGHT BE DONE.

By CHARLES MACKAY, Esq., LL.D.

What might be done if men were wise—
What glorious deeds, my suffering brother,
Would they unite,
In love and right,
And cease their scorn of one another?

Oppression's heart might be imbued
With kindling drops of loving-kindness,
And knowledge pour,
From shore to shore,
Light on the eyes of mental blindness.

All slavery, warfare, lies, and wrongs,—
All vice and crime might die together;
And milk and corn,
To each man born,
Be free as warmth in summer weather.

The meanest wretch that ever trod—
The deepest sunk in guilt and sorrow,
Might stand erect
In self-respect,
And share the teeming world to-morrow.

What might be done? This might be done,
And more than this, my suffering brother—
More than the tongue
Ere said or sung,—
If men were wise and loved each other.

ON MAGNETIC HEALING,

By BERNARD RAGAZZI.

(Editor of Le Journal du Magnetisme, Geneva.)

I.

There is in human beings a force which can be projected by those in whom it is positive and directed upon those in whom it is negative, inducing in them modifications of their state. Such a force could not have escaped recognition by thinkers in ancient times; we learn from history that it was studied in the temples of India, Egypt and Greece. Ancient priesthoods ruled the masses by the power they derived from their knowledge; but they themselves being under the sway of egoism, led them in the dark according to their own selfish ends.

Jesus Christ, sent of God, came to enlighten mankind: in testimony of His mission He performed works, the like of which had never been done by man, and He proclaimed that all who would be His disciples might do the same. A few understood and followed Him, and—moved by the same spirit—performed similar works.

The lovers of darkness struggled against the light; but the light went on shining; sometimes in obscure retreats, sometimes held aloft by brave descendants of the disciples, although many were martyred by the descendants of those who had sacrificed their Divine Master.

The light shone fitfully through the dark ages of Europe. At length, towards the close of the last century, the fires of the Inquisition becoming extinguished, another light-bearer appeared in Anton Mesmer. Born in Switzerland, he studied the healing art and graduated as a physician at Vienna. Dissatisfied with the theories and practices of the schools of his day, and urged forward by his genius and fine intelligence, he persevered in the study he had already begun of the works of predecessors—philosophical physicians of kindred minds—Paracelsus, Van Helmont, and others, who had descanted upon a vital force in man exhibiting properties analogous to those of the loadstone (Magnès), and which vital force they characterised as Animal Magnetism. By numerous experiments Mesmer established in his own mind the reality of this force and its analogy with that of the mineral, and in his disquisitions upon it, designated it the animal magnetic fluid. He employed it therapeutically in the disorders to which he had chiefly devoted his studies. By extraordinary cures he attained the conviction of its superiority as a therapeutic agent.

He transmitted his experiments and his conclusions to the leading learned bodies in Europe, but they disregarded them. He imparted them, and the doctrine he deduced from them, to the public.

Like every truth it was subjected, at its first publication, to detraction and repulsion by men who, brought up in old errors, had no room in their minds for a new truth. Becoming the object of orthodox persecutions, he removed to Paris. There he was well received by many influential persons, among whom was Dr. Deslon, physician to the King's brother the Comte d'Artois, and by other physicians.

But before his doctrine could gain general acceptance in France, political troubles began. Foreseeing revolution, he withdrew to Spa, where he practised healing upon all who came to him, and there died at an advanced age.

The light of Animal Magnetism was then maintained in France by the Marquis de Puységur and his brother; others succeeded: among them, Deleuze, Teste, and notably the Baron Dupôtet, all, especially the last, worthy contributors to the literature of the subject. It was Dupôtet who, in 1846, founded the Société Magnétique in Paris, which still flourishes. He was a potent magnetiser.

It was in his time that another gifted magnetiser, the Commandant Laforgue, performed wonderful cures. On his leaving the army at sixty, he devoted the rest of his days to healing the diseases of his fellow-creatures by magnetism; up to eighty-four years of age he received the sick in the hermitage, where his career of charity and benevolence closed with his earthly life.

RECORDS OF PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

[In this column will be given from time to time such accounts of psychical phenomena as seem to be worthy of permanent record. Beyond the general classification indicated, no attempt at tabulation will at present be made; that work will follow in due course. In furtherance of this object we shall be pleased to receive from our readers brief reports of phenomena subject to two conditions. (1) That a colourless statement of facts without comment is given; and (2) that communications are accompanied by the names and addresses of those concerned, not necessarily for publication, though we should naturally prefer to be at liberty to publish them. Amongst the phenomena referred to may be mentioned:—

- A.—Mesmerism.
- B.—Trance.
- C.—Clairvoyance.
- D.—Thought-reading.
- E.—Previsional and Coincidental Dreams.
- F.—Apparitions.
- G.—The Human "Double."
- H.—Presence at a Distance.
- I.—Haunted Houses.

- K.—Spirit Identity.
- L.—Materialised Spirit Forms.
- M.—The Spirit Itap.
- N.—The Spirit Voice.
- O.—Psychography.
- P.—Automatic Writing.
- Q.—Movement of Material Objects without Physical Contact.
- R.—Miscellaneous Phenomena.

Friends having had experience of any of these phenomena will be doing us a service if they will report them to us, giving—

- (1) The names and addresses of the persons concerned.
- (2) The circumstances under which the phenomena took place.
- (3) A brief account of the occurrence.

Letters should be addressed to the Editor of "LIGHT," 16, Craven-street, Charing Cross.]

CLASS F.—APPARITIONS.

The two following narratives were given me by a brother and sister, children of a country rector forty or fifty miles from London. The gentleman is a solicitor in London, and it so happened that he paid his first visit to his father's rectory last Easter. He arrived early on the 8th April; dined in the middle of the day; had a light supper with a glass and a-half of claret at nine o'clock. He then proceeds as follows:—"Went to bed at eleven; asleep at once; room comfortable; fire burning in the grate, and one candle left alight; doors carefully closed before going to bed, but not fastened. In the middle of the night woke up without any apparent cause (I suppose about two o'clock) and saw the figure of a man dressed in a black frock coat of clerical cut, tightly buttoned up, standing motionless and silent at the foot of the bed, who, after a short pause, moved slowly to the door and disappeared. Could not next day remember who the figure was like. Have thought since that it was more like that of Mr. H., some time curate of A., than of anyone else. Thought nothing of it; but on sitting up in bed saw that the door was open, say three inches ajar, so got out of bed and closed it again carefully. Soon after went to sleep again and slept till 8 a.m., and told them the story at breakfast."

This account of his night's adventure was written by Mr. W. for his sister, within a few days, while the particulars were fresh in his memory. Subsequently, on a second visit about two months afterwards, he recognised his nocturnal visitor in a gentleman whom he had never seen at the date of his vision, and who was destined to succeed his father in the living. In answer to a letter of mine he says: "The remainder of the story, as told to you, is quite correct, viz: that on a second visit some two months after the first, as I was strolling in the garden alone, I met and instantly recognised as an old acquaintance my spiritual visitor at Easter, who now stood before me in the flesh. I shook hands with him, and was on the point of saying, 'When did we meet last?' but checked myself in time, as it instantly flashed across my mind that it was my spiritual visitor at Easter who now stood before me in the flesh. In the course of conversation I ascertained that he was coming to dine at the rectory, and from my sister I learnt his name, and the position he held with respect to my father, viz., his being at present his curate, with the right to presentation to the rectory at the next vacancy. I forget whether in the written statement I made at Easter I mentioned that I did not look upon my visitor as one who was visiting me personally, as he appeared scarcely to notice me, while he regarded the premises with the critical eye of a surveyor."—H. WEDGWOOD, 31, Queen Anne-street, W.

The second story I had from the sister, an instance of the frequency with which this liability to abnormal experiences is found to run in families.

"The occurrence to which you refer happened as long ago as twelve years back, but was so impressed upon my memory that I am not likely to forget it. We were then living in an adjoining parish to this, of which my father was vicar, and at that time there was no one in the house but my father and myself and the servants. We had all gone to our rooms at the usual time, and according to my custom I had locked my room door, and had gone to sleep. I was suddenly awakened with a distinct impression there was somebody present in the room standing by the side of my bed, close by. Such an indescribable horror came over me that I remember shutting my eyes and covering up my face, lest I should see what I felt was in the room. While I was lying like this in the dark, too much frightened to light a candle, I heard the clock strike three. I don't know how long I remained in this state of terror, but I never moved, and at last fell asleep. As soon as I went downstairs I immediately told my father what a fright I had had at three o'clock. He said, 'This is very strange, for I have just been hearing the very same thing from Mr. K.' (the churchwarden, living close by) 'how he had been alarmed in the same way by thinking someone was standing by his bed, and how he had awakened his wife, and told her to look at the clock, for he knew that they should hear of something in the morning.' He brought the news to my father that Mr. W., the other churchwarden, also a farmer in the parish, had died unexpectedly at 3 a.m."

It will be observed that the departing churchwarden stood in some sort of relation to the daughter of his rector, and to his fellow churchwarden.—H. WEDGWOOD, 31, Queen Anne-street, W.

THE MUSIC OF THE SPHERES.

I had read in ancient story how the starry worlds on high Ring like magic golden circlets with eternal harmony, And to pure souls and noble God had in mercy given, To hear the mystic glories of those sparkling hosts of Heaven.

Was it a dream? I know not! But methought I stood one night

On some lone mountain, drinking in a vision of delight. All around me, all beneath me, did the heavenly music roll, And with soft and soothing influence crept deep into my soul.

As I listened, lost in rapture, with my inmost soul laid bare, Floating slowly, lightly, round me rose that music thro' the air, Rose up quivering to the stars, and from those radiant orbs of light

Drew down an answering harmony that filled the silent night.

I know not how long thus I stood, for listening to that chime In reverent, glad adoring, I lost all note of time, But it ceased, and left my spirit too full of awe for fears, Too glad for exultation, too solemn far for tears.

The music of those Heaven spheres I have never heard again, But its echo lives within me, turning life's discordant pain Into anthems pure and holy; and with fervent, child-like love I bless the great God-Father for that music from above.

And if sometimes life's dark passions make my pulse beat fierce and high,

Or my heart grows chill and weary with life's depths of mystery, In my spirit's deepest cloisters sound those bell-like numbers pure,

And a fresh strength rises in my soul to strive and to endure.

MILDRED KENT.

A MATERIALISATION SEANCE.—We have had at Boston Mrs. Carrie W. Sawyer. She has been a guest of Mrs. W. S. Butler for some weeks, and the manifestations through her at that lady's house gave great satisfaction. She has now taken the house formerly owned by the late Mary Hardy, one of our best test mediums; that departed lady has already put in an appearance, and one of her controls, Big Dick, has also made his presence known. I was at the seance last Sunday evening, with many Spiritualists, mediums, and some sceptics. Mrs. Sawyer sat at one end of the cabinet, constructed by friend W. S. Butler, with a bandage round her neck, the ends were then brought out and tied outside without any slack. Under this test condition, two forms, sometimes three, came out into the room. Once there came out a man, then a woman, and then another man; and while all three were out and active, another, Maudie, showed herself at the aperture and talked with several in the circle.—From a Note by JOHN WETHERBEE.

The Unconscious Secondary Self.

SIR,—Thank you for inserting my last letter, but I really think your printer's "unconscious self" must have had a hand in it, so many and so curious were its mistakes! One, at least, of them making my meaning quite as obscure as were any of "Clelia's" anagrams! and as some of the paragraphs were shortened at both ends (making what was left sound a little disconnected) I will act upon your gentle hint and make this letter shorter, which, indeed, will be easy as I have less to say.

For writing at all, I have had two motives. I not only wished to add my protest to that of others against the theory of any "second" self, but I find in all the Spiritualistic literature I ever see so few accounts of personal experiences (is it that there are few who can give them or that they withhold them?) that it seemed to me almost selfish to say nothing of my own. Nothing will tend so much to make converts to our faith as experiences of the kind. No "dark séances," where guitars float round the room, or tables rise into the air; and no séances in the light, where the "materialised forms" that come from a cabinet, decline to be followed back into it, or to be investigated in any way, could have with these anxious to believe in the subject, half the weight of even simpler manifestations, that always court investigation, and where there is no darkness because there is nothing to conceal. If I add that before the experiences to which I have alluded, I was a "sceptic of the sceptics," scarcely daring to believe in any future life at all, and much less in the possibility of having proof of it, and that now I am not less certain of a future life than I am of this present one, my testimony to the truth of Spiritualism may have more weight than if I had given too ready credence, as I must think some have done, to everything that has been done in its name.

In the second object I had in writing—the annihilation of that "second" self, to which is ascribed so much that we believe can only be explained by "external" or "spirit agency," I have kept in reserve my strongest weapon. From my own "automatic writing" I showed the difficulty of believing in any such explanation, but through Mr. Eglington's wonderful "slate writing" (as it is called) it seems to me that "external" and intelligent agency can be absolutely proved; and if so, it will surely be admitted that the "second" self may go; that the theory that will not cover all the different manifestations of the phenomenon of "automatic writing" need not be accepted as the explanation of any of them. I do not say it could not be, if it were not open to other and very serious objections.

For some time past I have been anxious to see something of the "slate writing," of which I had heard and read so much; so being in London a few weeks ago, I arranged for a séance with Mr. Eglington. I was accompanied by a friend, and we intended on the way to provide ourselves with slates, but did not see any—and I do not think it could have made the slightest difference, especially as the instance of the writing of which I thought most occurred upon a slate that closed and locked, and a slate of this kind it is scarcely likely we should have found. This is the only instance of which I will give particulars, as it seemed to us the most interesting and the most impossible of all. I sat at some distance from Mr. Eglington, the lady who was with me being next to him. After we had seen some instances of writing upon the single slate (which indeed was generally doubled by another slate being placed upon it), Mr. Eglington requested me to write a question upon the slate that closed and locked, and when I had written the question, that no one but myself could possibly have seen, putting inside the slate a scrap of red slate pencil, I closed and locked it, and passed it to Mr. Eglington. He and my friend (who, by the way, I have always considered very "mediumistic") held it together, sometimes upon the table and sometimes just under the edge of it, and in about two minutes we all distinctly heard the writing being done inside the slate, with the three little taps that announce that it is finished. Then the slate was passed to me (I had kept possession of the key), to be unlocked; and on the side of the slate opposite my question, and written with the red pencil (the pencil lying upon the last stroke of the last word) was a perfectly correct answer, consisting of about half-a-dozen words, to the question I had written!

Now, if this account is correct—and in every particular it is absolutely correct—will anyone suggest where trickery was possible; and failing trickery as the explanation, must it not be admitted that intelligence was shown and writing was done without either the conscious or the "unconscious" help of any of those who were present? The theory of a "second" self must be given up here, or I think we must give up, and confess that life is too hard for us! For where might not that "secondary" self of ours be quite at home, and of what might it not be capable if a locked-up slate presents no obstacles either to its presence or its activity?

But to conclude, seriously. What earnest Spiritualist does not believe that members of the Psychical Society have only to continue fearlessly their researches to be convinced that in Spiritualism they will find a truer solution of some of the many difficulties that will confront them than in any "unconscious or secondary self," which, after all, is but a development of Dr. Carpenter's "Unconscious Cerebration!"—I am, sir, yours, &c.,

EVIL SPIRITS.—Spirits are disembodied human beings, and as some of these are bad there must be bad spirits; the selfish and sordid wake up in the next state as they were; whatever of "evil" is in them now was developed in them while here. There are many social inducements to continuing in "evil" while here in the body, but I do not see inducements for continuing in it in the other state. There are, certainly, foolish, frolicsome spirits, but I am not one to call these "evil." What "evil" is intrinsically, I do not know. I know that murder is called "evil," and that wholesale murders are committed on battlefields and scaffolds without being so called. Arson is called "evil,"—a crime; but cities, ships, and dwellings are burnt without being so called; and our Christian forefathers burnt the most precious corporeal habitations of human souls, without its being considered "evil."—From a Note by WARREN CHASE.

A DREAM.—"In your twenty-third number I read an interesting account of Lord Brougham and the ghost which reminded me of a dream I had a few years ago. I was living with a sister and her husband in Wilts; and, as he was elderly, he constituted me his amanuensis. I was accustomed to go every day to his study, to write letters, &c. I had a dear brother in the Brazils, and one night I dreamt that I was with him, and that he put my hand on his heart and fell dead in my arms. This so affected me that I awoke, jumped up, and prayed that it might not be true. After breakfast, when I tried to be cheerful on account of my sister, who was not in good health, my brother-in-law asked me to follow him to his study. He then said, 'I have had a letter from your brother-in-law.' I said, 'Do not say another word; I know that it tells the death of my brother,' and told him my dream. He said, 'It is true. This letter is from a friend in Brazil, and contains an account of his death from heart-disease. I would not disclose it to your sister fearing the result in her present nervous state.'—M. A. C., in "Casell's Saturday Journal."

For the last two months, Mrs. Elsie Reynolds has visited our "garden city," and given two séances a week, light and dark. At the dark, spirit forms are visible even to their lineaments, by their own light. Their luminosity is inodorous and smokeless. At our last séance, at Professor Holmes' in Seventh-street, the medium sat before the curtain of the cabinet until entranced; then she passed within it, and instantaneously the curtains reopened, revealing a form in drapery completely star-spangled. In the course of the séance an arm was projected from between the curtains with a scroll of some velvet-like material on which were inscribed the words, "Friends, we come to bring proofs of immortality," in raised whitish letters. The hand turned the scroll about that all might read it. I have attended all the séances. Some of the forms have resembled the medium, others have been many inches taller or shorter. Some reveal their countenances, others are veiled. One of the medium's controls, who gives the name of Gruff, speaks by the independent voice, which sounds from all parts, sometimes from the floor, sometimes from overhead. In answer to questions, he says that some of the forms we have seen were transfigurations of the medium, that others were materialisations of the spirit; but that the medium is always entranced, and therefore quite unconscious.—T. B. T., San José, Cal.,—Spiritual Offering.

position and attitude excluding the supposition of muscular action.* Somnambules in the bath show sometimes a diminution of their normal weight, sufficing to keep them floating with immersion of but a small part of the body, and the obstinacy with which whole centuries adhered to the water proof of witches suggests that the latter, falling into reflex-hypnotism through fear, sometimes experienced a diminution of weight. On this same reduction of weight in the ecstatic condition rests also the direct proof of weight by the "witch-scales." Lastly, we hear of mediums being raised in the air, sometimes in dark sittings, when they write something on the ceiling, sometimes also by subdued gas-light. (Ps. St. VI., 566.) This flying is also reported of Jamblichus, Faust, of various witches and saints, the testimony being especially strong in the case of Joseph of Copertinus, pronounced a saint two years after his death, who is even said twice to have raised another in the air with him. (Ps. St. IV., 241 et seq.) The condition of the levitation seems always to be the completely somnambulant state of the medium; but since this is likewise most adapted to the transmission of hallucinations to the spectators, and it is usually after a number of sittings with the same circle—and then at the close of the sitting, when those present have become susceptible to the implantation of hallucinations—that this phenomenon occurs, it is here particularly necessary to confirm its objective reality by durable proofs.†

The phenomena in question are only explicable by a polarity of nerve force in analogy with frictional electricity. Were it a case of repulsion only of charged bodies from the earth in opposition to gravitation, a simple force would do; but as the dynamical relations of bodies charged with nerve force to the earth are sometimes conformable and sometimes opposed to gravitation, apparently a double sort of charging, dependent on the somnambulant will of the medium, must be admitted. And this is inferable back also to the attraction and repulsion of objects by the medium, as his repulsion to all neutral bodies must be the same. The explanation by a polaric force had been already advanced by the old Indians, who asserted that the force of gravity is suppressed and transformed into its opposite by conversion of the polarity of the body. It may here be remembered that Zöllner has attempted to explain universal gravitation from the static effects of electricity,‡ and that with all difference of different natural forces they are undoubtedly but derivatives from the same primitive forces. If Zöllner's view is granted, and the supposition is made that the nerve force alters the statical-electrical condition of the body, on which its gravitation depends, we should in fact have to do with only one force, which not merely neutralises or outweighs the action of the force of gravity, but augments, reduces, or negatives the force of gravity itself, without it being permissible on that account to speak of a suspension or breach of the laws of nature.

The behaviour of floating objects is similar, according to Cox, to that of a small air balloon; their weight is never changed suddenly, but gradually; they ascend gently and without jerk, coming down in the same way, but always with light pendulous oscillations. No harm has ever been done when tables, with lighted petroleum lamps on them, have risen, the quietness of the motion, and the slowness and slightness of the oscillations not occasioning overthrow of the lamps. Besides the oscillations, the floating objects exhibit tremors, such as may be most clearly seen from the automatic curves of Crookes' experiments,

* [I was sitting once with Slade, in New York, by bright daylight, when his chair was forced back from the table. My own chair being clear from the table, so that I commanded a full view of Slade's legs and feet, I asked that the chair on which I was sitting might also be pushed back with me on it. This was immediately done, two or three inches, the motion being at right angles to the medium.—Tr.]

† It is quite easy to excite in a somnambulant the hallucination that the magnetiser is flying round the room. (Psych. Stud. III., 636, 537.)

and which are unmistakably connected with the simultaneous pulse-curves of the medium, as the sphygmograph would show them. This is the most distinct proof that the force really proceeds from the medium, and from the medium alone. All mediumistic phenomena are, moreover, not constant, but fluctuate continually in irregular waves, in correspondence with the innervation waves streaming from the medium's middle brain into his organism.

The results usually gain in strength when the medium is not alone, but in a small circle of both sexes. It seems as if a medium has the power of making those present more or less mediums also, that is, of occasioning them unconsciously to develop nerve force, and that he is further able definitely to influence the distribution and application of the general nerve force thus developed. It takes a period of from a few minutes to several quarters-of-an-hour to charge the place and the medium sufficiently for the production of extraordinary effects. These, therefore, happen mostly at the close of sittings, or at least in the latter half of them, and they are more intense the more mediums—that is, persons developing nerve force—there are present, by whose unconscious co-operation the principal medium is supported. For weak mediums, therefore, a "circle" is strictly indispensable, and only strong mediums can elicit important effects also alone; regard should be had to this in experiments with inexperienced or moderately qualified mediums.

From the combination of the action of attraction and repulsion with that which alters the weight of objects already result the most manifold phenomena. The floating objects can advance to and retreat from the medium through the air as well as by horizontal motion. The same object (as a small table) can for instance slide along the floor from the medium, rise in the remotest corner of the room, and then hover down or fall obliquely on the séance table. Water rises unseen from a can standing apart, and descends in a drizzle on the spectators. It happens again and again that bells ring in a house at certain hours for days or weeks together, and go on ringing, or are torn down, notwithstanding all fastening and muffling,* or that premises are regularly bombarded with stones, coals, or other things lying about, without the police or those privately posted for observation being able to discover a trace of the originator of the mischief.† Usually there turns out to be a servant-maid, or an hysterical female, or a child in the years of development, by whose presence in the place the phenomenon is conditioned, and in whose proximity the projectiles fall. The officials and private people have seldom any suspicion of such connection, and rather believe in ghost pranks than that it is a medium unconsciously perpetrating the mischief.

Considering that the different objects in the sitting-room and the different persons present are in different degrees charged, partly through distribution by the medium of the collective force, partly through active co-operation, it is intelligible that the lighter objects, especially when floating, are subject simultaneously to very different attractions and repulsions, and follow the most tortuous paths. If the medium directs, by repulsion, an object to where the attractive sphere of one of the party predominates, the object glides or floats to that person, and to that part of the body, it may be a hand, which is most charged. Thus is to be explained, for instance, Hellenbach's experience of a slate creeping up his body to the hand.

The mediumistic nerve force can further variously combine with involuntary muscular activity, which at sitting round a table is usually the first thing developed, the charging with nerve force gradually increasing till that alone suffices; so that the objects at first only move by contact, but afterwards without.

Nor do the above phenomena exhaust the effects of mediumistic nerve force. Especially noticeable is its expansive counteraction of the cohesion of material particles, expressed by sudden discharges in the nature of electrical reports. When the explosive discharge, which always occurs in a closely circumscribed spot, and indeed usually in the interior of bodies, does not overcome the material cohesion, it announces itself to the sense of touch as a tremulous concussion, and is perceptible to hearing by a stronger or weaker crackling or rapping sound. When it overcomes cohesion, there is besides a tearing to pieces or shattering of the object. (Zöllner's bed-screen* and tumbler.) The rap sounds begin with the faintest crepitations (as with an electrical machine), sometimes increasing to uproarious din and clatter;† they resound sometimes from tables, chairs, partitions, walls; sometimes from small utensils, sometimes from massive rocks;‡ and it seems that the louder can be localised as well by vibrations sensible to touch as by the ear. Observation by the microtelephone from a great distance and registration by the phonograph are always to be desired, in order to distinguish possibly transferred hallucinations of hearing and touch from objective occurrences.

Similar sounds constantly occur in the most different places, with or without the movement of utensils and furniture, no one in the house or the neighbourhood being in the least able to trace the cause. As with the stone-throwing mentioned above, there is always a medium, usually of the female sex, who is, at first quite unconsciously, the cause. Should the neighbourhood come to suspect this causal connection, there is generally a combination of the brutality of the lower police with the narrow and zealous superstition of parsondom and populace to drive the poor nervous patient quite distracted, instead of her being placed under medical treatment, or of her mediumistic aptitudes being systematically utilised for experiment.

We encounter a specially improbable class of phenomena in reports relating to the penetration of matter. The Indian reports regard them as indisputable facts, and explain them by the dissipation and re-condensation of the elementary constituents of the material object. A wrought-iron ring shall get upon the arm of the medium while the latter's hand or finger is grasped by one of the party; Reimers and Aksakow have seen the experiment succeed when the hand of the holder was bound to the medium's arm (Ps. St. I., 544; III., 52-54); and Olcott even asserts that he observed the side of the ring, applied to the medium's arm, dissolve as it were into a vapour, thus permitting penetration of the arm. (Ps. St. III., 56.)§ Zöllner's observations of similar occurrences are numerous, the passing of coins, slate-pencils, &c., through closed boxes and table surfaces, placing a ring round the leg of a table, tying of knots in sealed strings and strips, and so on;|| and a great part of these phenomena have been repeated by private mediums. (Ps. St. VII., 390, 392.) According to Hare, two balls of platinum were conveyed into a sealed glass tube.¶ Even with presupposition of the greatest expertness in untying and retying knots, and in stripping off and on of nooses and fastenings, there remain a multitude of accounts in which the mode of applying and sealing the fastenings, and the inviolableness of the seals after the processes, appear as exclusive of this obvious explanation as is the briefness of the interval available for such manipulations. It is therefore generally accepted among the Spiritists that a medium in the somnambulant state is able, by the penetration of matter, to get free from and to resume every sort of fastening.

The mediumistic stone-throwing, by which window panes, &c., are usually broken, often happens also when the medium is in a closed room, the stones coming from outside, and being visible first in the room when five or six feet from the floor. (Ps. St. VIII., 5-12.) Water sprinkling happens, no water having been before in the room, though with Zöllner's experiences of this there was a can of water in the next room. The "apport" of objects from other rooms or houses, or of flowers which were growing in the open air, into the séance room, is one of the commonest of mediumistic phenomena, but the earthly origin of the objects introduced can always be proved. The stones are dry or wet, warm or cold, according to the weather, and marked stones, after being put out of doors, have often fallen a second time in the house. Were these phenomena connected with a fourth dimension of real space, as Zöllner thought, we should expect that material objects not belonging to our three-dimensional world would be introduced; from the contrary it must be concluded that Zöllner's explanation is not the right one, but that the entire course of the phenomena belongs as much to our three-dimensional world as does the material employed in them. The occasional incandescence, or traces of it, which Zöllner says he observed, likewise points rather to molecular disturbances of material cohesion than to motions and oscillations beyond three-dimensional space, which would not occasion molecular disturbances and changes of temperature.

Also to be noticed are the phenomena of lights, which almost never wholly fail at sittings with powerful mediums. They are usually so weak as only to be observed in the dark, and even then only by a sensitive sight. Exceptionally, however, they attain greater strength, so that all see them. It seems still questionable whether the appearance of light observed by Zöllner on the wall, and which was broken by the shadows of the feet of the table, really signified a source of light beyond the table, or whether it was not formed direct; as also it remains in the first case doubtful, whether the parallel beams of light really proceeded from an infinitely remote source, or whether these transverse ether vibrations in parallel directions were not occasioned by wholly different means and in a wholly different way than by illuminating material (light vibrations of particular material particles at a particular place).* Sensitives and somnambules often see luminous phenomena which appear to them to come from an infinite distance, but the involuntary conclusion of sense, founded on the ordinary originating causes of ether vibrations, need not correspond with the facts.

For the study of these questions we must decidedly revert to the experiences of Reichenbach, who asserts the odic diaphaneity of many substances which for ordinary rays of light are impenetrable. It seems that we have here in many cases to do with ether vibrations of higher frangibility and of another kind, which are first converted into light vibrations in the eye of the sensitive (or of one made temporarily sensitive by the medium). This is confirmed by experiments of the photographer Beattie, who obtained on the plates different appearances of lights which were invisible to him and his companions, but the photographic forms of which agreed with the descriptions given by mediums, of lights seen by them at different spots during the exposure. (Ps. St. V., 339; VIII., 257.) These photographic experiments must be extensively followed up, for the safe distinction between what in these luminous phenomena are implanted hallucination, and what objective vibration processes. So far as it is a case of true ether vibrations of high frangibility, we may speculate on forms of conversion of the mediumistic nerve force, analogous to the conversion of electricity into light of high frangibility. On the other hand, these phenomena must be investigated with complete exactitude, and all attempts at a three-dimensional explanation must be entirely exhausted before approaching one from the hypothetical fourth dimension, as Zöllner, it is evident, too hastily did.

If the mediumistic nerve force can, on the one hand, be converted into phenomena of light and heat, and on the other, has the property of accumulating at limited points in a degree of intensity leading to explosive discharge, it is scarcely surprising if such discharges, like electric sparks, are able to kindle combustible substances, for instance, the new wick of a stearine candle, as reported by Zöllner* (Vol. III).

"DER SPIRITISMUS."

In my preliminary note to the translation of the above, in "LIGHT" of August 22nd, I observed, "We see no difference in principle between the a priori negation of facts, so well condemned by the author of this pamphlet, and the a priori negation of hypotheses which contain no logical contradiction." And further on "From the standpoint of von Hartmann's philosophy, the agency of spirits is an inadmissible hypothesis and personal immortality is a delusion." I have received a letter from Dr. von Hartmann calling my attention to these two passages, which he objects to as misrepresenting his position. He says (I translate his words): "You seem to attribute to me the rejection of the hypothesis of the co-operation of surviving deceased persons as one a priori inadmissible because not reconcilable with my metaphysical system. This, however, is not the case. Certainly I hold the survival of the personally conscious spirit after death to be very improbable according to the whole state of our present knowledge (because without the Meta-organism of Hellenbach and Du Prel—a very improbable hypothesis—it seems unthinkable), but by no means impossible; if the proof of it were adduced, my metaphysic would offer no greater difficulty than any other to the acceptance of this doctrine." (There is then a reference to the "Philosophy of the Unconscious," with the remark: "As soon as it could be shown that with the dissolution of the cellular body the 'Meta-organism' is not dissolved also, the fasciculus of actions of the unconscious would have in the latter a continuing object and support.") He continues: "I hold every hypothesis to be inadmissible only for so long as it is superfluous, carries us no further, and is not properly legitimated. The contest turns upon the legitimation of the hypothesis by facts, not upon a priori possibility or impossibility. My methodological principle that the causes of phenomena are to be sought as long as possible in the natural sphere, and, indeed, first in that part of it with which we are empirically familiar, and that this should not be overstepped till all its means of research and possibilities of explanation are thoroughly exhausted, will be disputed by no prudent investigator. Many go further, and assert that at this frontier the non liquet begins. I am not one of these, as my essay at a supernatural explanation of Provision shows. Just as little do I belong to those who confound the [whole] phenomenal natural province with the part of it which is known and familiar to us. I only mean that the burden of proof is upon him who asserts; that not the slightest proof of the spirit-hypothesis has been adduced; and that therefore it is for me, at least provisionally, 'temporarily inadmissible.' I hold this standpoint to be methodologically absolutely unassailable; the dispute can only be whether with the common recognition of this methodological principle, there are already facts utterly inexplicable by all other hypotheses (not merely by that preferred by me), yet which are really intelligible upon the spirit-hypothesis. To this discussion I look with interest." The letter concludes with references to the author's writings throwing light on his position in regard to the belief in immortality, re-incarnation, &c.

Whether my remarks were or were not apparently justified by the general tenor of this pamphlet, I can hardly regret them, since they have elicited from the distinguished author so interesting a statement of his position.

SOME ODD "FADS" AND FANCIES; THEIR RATIONALE AND EXPLANATION.

By S. EADON, M.D.

IV.

In mining districts a superstition prevails that some are born with an occult power of detecting metallic lodes and underground currents of water, and some of even telling how far from the surface. In Cornwall about one in every forty persons is thought to be thus endowed, i.e., according to Reichenbach, there is a real sensitive born in every forty. The divining rod is the means made use of to detect these underground marvels. But what is a divining rod? Dr. Herbert Mayo, formerly professor of anatomy and physiology, Kings' College, London, thus describes it:—"They cut a hazel twig, just below where it forks. Having stripped the leaves off, they cut each branch to a little more than a foot in length, leaving the stump three inches long, in shape like the letter Y. The hazel is selected for the purpose because it branches more symmetrically than its neighbours." Dr. Mayo then gives the following directions how it is to be used in the search of water or of metals. "The hazel fork is to be held by the two branches, one in each hand, the stump or point projecting straight forward. The arms of the experimenter hang by his side, but the elbows being bent at a right angle; the fore-arms are advanced horizontally, the hands being held seven or eight inches apart; the knuckles down and the thumb outwards. The ends of the branches of the divining fork appear between the roots of the thumb and the forefingers." Thus armed the seer walks over the ground he intends to explore and, if he possesses the mystic gift, as soon as he passes over either a seam of metal or a natural spring of water, the hazel fork will at once begin to move. Count de Tristram details its motion thus:—"When two or three steps have been made upon the existing tract of ground, the fork, which, at starting, is held horizontally, with the point forwards, begins gently to ascend; it gradually attains a perpendicular or vertical position; sometimes it passes beyond that, and lowering itself, with its point to the chest of the operator, it becomes again horizontal. If the motion continues, the rod ascending becomes vertical with the point downwards. Finally, the rod may again ascend and resume its first position. When the action is very lively the rod immediately commences a second revolution, and so it goes on as long as the operator continues to walk over the existing surface of ground." With this hazel fork metallic lodes and currents of water underground have been discovered; and Saucier, the celebrated finder of water, made so many discoveries of this kind as to gain the wonder and gratitude of half the people of France. To Saucier himself the power was a mystery, but the discovery of OD tears away the veil, and makes the divining rod the common property of the world. These uncommon people are seers or sensitives, and the divining rod, or hazel fork, or white thorn, is only an outward symbol that a relationship is existing and taking place at the time between them and a vein of metal, or a current of water, beneath their feet, as the case may be. The practice of finding out a metallic lode, or a subterranean current, or a hidden treasure, has been followed, time out of mind, by the people in the counties of Devon, Cornwall, and Somerset, and is known by the name of Dowsing.

Amongst other proofs of this sort of relationship Reichenbach one day took Miss Zinkel, a sensitive, into the park which surrounds his country house. He knew the direction of a water-pipe which was under a large wooded meadow. He let her go across the meadow, but as she approached the pipe she hesitated, stepped to go back, and then stood still. She had no divining rod in her hand, but she felt in her left foot, up to the knee, a peculiar lukewarm sensation, which she had not felt before in any other part of the meadow. The fact was she was then standing over the water-pipe. This experiment was tried with many other sensitives, and the result was the same. With the divining rod in hand, its motions, more or less, would have told the same story, viz., that it was the influence of OD developed by the running of water through the pipe producing a certain physical effect on the nervous system.

In his work "On the Truths contained in Popular Superstitions," Dr. Herbert Mayo says: "There must be a real foundation for the belief of ages"; and also, that "There can be no prevalent delusion without a correspondent truth." Although unmerciful contempt has been poured by certain cultivators of science, upon the "Virgula divina," the "baguette" divinatoire, the "Baculus divinatorius," or the divining rod, yet there are facts innumerable upon record to prove that it is something more than a mere wild fancy, as its indications have led to many useful applications; its unmistakable influence on certain persons of exalted sensitiveness shows that it has its origin in Nature; and the experiments of Reichenbach prove that the phenomenon can be satisfactorily and scientifically accounted for.

In a translation by Dr. Charles Hutton, of Montucl's improvement of Ozanam's Mathematical Recreations, the "divining rod" is ridiculed by Dr. Hutton in such a style as to lead to the Doctor's receiving a note of remonstrance from a lady, who informed him that she would come to Woolwich Common (the residence of the Doctor) and demonstrate to him and his friends, that his remarks were unfounded and in direct opposition to facts. The lady on her return from the Continent, called and gave her proofs. Conviction took the place of disbelief, and Dr. Hutton in the next edition of the book, had the candour to acknowledge his error, and stated, moreover, that there was clearly an innate foundation in Nature for the phenomena manifested. This individual was no other than the Honourable Lady Milbank, the mother of Lady Byron, the wife of the great Poet, Lord Byron.

Thouvenal, a celebrated physician of France, fell in with a man named Bleton, a discoverer (by trade) of springs, by means of the divining rod. Thouvenal, to see if there was any truth in it, tried this man more than 600 times, and in the presence of 150 persons of all ranks and grades, amongst whom was Jaclet, professor of physics, at Nancy. This seer, like Lady Milbank, knew when water was beneath his feet by the rise of a peculiar internal feeling about the region of the diaphragm which was always coincident with the movements of the hazel-rod; the feelings being more or less strong according to the volume and depth of the water. Bleton was not a sick sensitive; for, during an illness, the power left him, and it was three months after he got well before the former condition returned. Whilst this man was walking, trying to discover lodes or seams of metal, or springs of water, Thouvenal counted the motions of the divining rod which he held in his hands, and observed that it made from thirty-five to eighty revolutions per minute. Another case. Mrs. G. had heard of the practice of dowsing for water. She had a servant susceptible to magnetic influence. They had bad water on the premises, and Mr. G. had tried again and again to find a fresh spring, but without success. It was proposed that the servant should be magnetised, and see what she could do. Harriet was operated upon, the divining rod put into her hand, and she was allowed to walk over the grounds, taking her own way. She went on for about twenty yards, when she suddenly stopped, as if she had been shot. No one spoke, but all kept their eyes on the divining rod, which twisted so far back, as if it were giving her pain to hold it. She at length cried out, "Don't you see the stick?—here it is—the water is here, under my very feet—I see it—I see it—let me look—don't speak—I like to look at it," and she sank down on the grass, and seemed more like a little witch than anything else. The spot was specially marked. Mr. G. caused a hole to be dug, and at the depth of three feet water was found. The well was bricked round, and a constant supply of excellent water was the result of this exploit with the divining rod in the hand of this mesmerised girl.

If we remember correctly, the artesian well which supplies the city of Chicago, in America, with thousands of gallons of water per day, was first pointed out by a sensitive of that city.

THE SPIRITUAL OUTLOOK.

XLI.

[We shall esteem it a favour on the part of our readers if they will forward us, for use in this column, any allusions to Spiritualism and Psychical Research they may come across in the course of their reading. We see a great many of these ourselves, but it is obvious that there must be many references to the subject which do not meet our eyes.—ED. OF "LIGHT."]

Facts: Yes, I am always proclaiming the necessity of facts to any real philosophy. We cannot prize them too highly. We cannot labour for any better object than to make them known. The one important thing is truth, which rests on observation. The one longing of the mind is for truth, as the one longing of the heart is for love.

I have just spent many hours in reading "Force and Matter: Empirico-philosophical studies, intelligibly rendered;" by Dr. Louis Büchner, President of the Medical Association of Hesse-Darmstadt, &c. Well, "Kraft und Stoff" is an able and learned book of the most ultra-Materialism which never could have been written had the author known one fact such as we have by hundreds in spiritual manifestations.

One fact—the commonest, the most familiar—a rap, a writing upon slate or paper—a materialisation—any of the scores of facts witnessed and recorded by Professor Zöllner, would have prevented Dr. Büchner from writing "Force and Matter," and saved me the trouble of reading its constant assertions of what I know to be untrue; and also saved the reader of these notes some bits of time and trouble.

Of course the book has its value, because it is full of facts—but all its reasoning is as false, as wrong, as bad and mischievous as it can be, because the most important facts, which ought to be, which must be, the basis of any true philosophy of humanity, are wanting.

The Materialists are right as far as they go. Their facts are interesting. I do not undervalue matter, or its forces, and their operations, but the reality of the spirit of man, and its survival of the failure and destruction of the material body, is a fact of transcendent interest and importance.

"But we believe that already," say some of my friends; "what need of facts to prove it?" Is your faith so strong that you would not care for certainty? Suppose it be "sure and certain"—to you; what of this Dr. Büchner? What of the thousands of Materialists, without hope, without the solace of faith? What they need is knowledge—and all real knowledge must rest upon the solid basis of facts.

I hope I do not undervalue any form of mediumship, but it seems to me that in our fight with Materialism and its logical and inevitable results, we need first and above all, the most simple, primitive, material manifestations—the solid, hard facts that no truly scientific mind can reject or undervalue.

Of course I am quite aware that truly scientific minds are not over-plentiful. A man in a pulpit is professionally unscientific. So is a man who has written a book to advocate some theory of philosophy or religion. People who run in grooves are necessarily and often hopelessly unscientific. The mind that can examine and accept a new truth—one which dissipates old opinions, prejudices, professions, is a treasure—splendid, but rare.

Great crowds at the "Inventions" have been entertained—more surprised than delighted—with the music (according to Oriental tastes) of the Royal Band of the King of Siam. But the far East also sends us accounts of extraordinary ascetics. Here is an account of one copied from a Bombay newspaper: "Syed Noor-ud-Hoodah, known as a pir (saint), from Bombay, has been entertained in Howrah by Baboo Baney Madhub Mookerjee, an interpreter of the High Court, Calcutta, for some six or seven months. He has the power to effect miraculous cures of incurable diseases. 'During the last cold weather he passed fifty-one days in a tank by keeping nearly the whole of his body under water, and now he has been living for nearly a fortnight inside a pucca grave, six feet deep, which has been wholly covered over with masonry, keeping only a small hole (the diameter of which is about two inches) in order to serve him with his daily food, which simply consists of an orange or pomegranate juice, with one almond only. In this state he will remain for fifty-one consecutive days; and through the hole a string has been passed into the grave, one end of it being tied to a bell suspended on a bamboo post near the grave, to enable him to give the alarm in case he encountered any danger or mishap, by pulling the string and ringing the bell, also to respond to calls inquiring after his health in like manner, signifying thereby that he was all right. The pir entered the grave with his bedding, some holy books, two or three bottles of rose-water, and one or two phials of otto of roses, after which the opening over the grave was blocked up, barring the hole, and then, levelling the place with earth, some greens were sown, which, being regularly watered, are thriving nicely all over the grave. The pir has taken the rose-water with him, it is said, in lieu of plain water to wash his face, hands, and feet before saying his daily prayers. A money order came to his address from Bombay five or six days ago, which was rolled up and dropped into the grave through the hole, and it was soon after returned through the hole duly signed by the pir.'"

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- F. F. COOK.—Received. Will appear.
H. W. HARRISON.—Will receive attention.
S. EADON.—We shall adopt your suggestion.
MR. BURCHETT.—"LIGHT" shall be kept for you as you request.
A. E. JONES.—Thanks for the cutting enclosed. Your order with reference to "LIGHT" is receiving attention.
A. FAIRLEY.—MS. received. Will receive due attention. We are glad you approve of the lines on which "LIGHT" is conducted. Our only desire is to arrive at truth, whether coincident or otherwise with the present views either of ourselves or those who write for its columns.
"LILY."—Will write shortly. We think events will justify the course taken with reference to the series of papers you mention, if for no other reason than that it is well at times to know and discuss the views held by our opponents. Mr. Eglington is now out of town for rest, but he will return on or about September 12th.
G. D. HAUGHTON.—The copies of "LIGHT" were duly sent to the address given, viz., High View, Bevois Hill, Southampton. Upon receipt of your card of complaint also bearing the same address, we sent duplicates. The next day the packet first sent was returned, the reason given by the Post Office officials for non-delivery being that you were not known at the address given, nor at Bognor to which town it had also travelled. The second bundle of duplicates has also been returned to us with the same inscription. Now we get another card from you with an exactly similar address. There is some mistake at your end. If you will look into it and let us know we will send the papers, but it is no use wasting stamps, time, and labour in sending the papers to an address from which they are constantly returned.

"THE GOLDEN GATE."—The four first numbers of this new Spiritualist paper have been forwarded to us. It is handsomely got up, of the size of the Spiritual Offering, and promises to be an able advocate of the cause. "While we shall aim," says the editor, "to present the best thoughts of the day on the philosophy of Modern Spiritualism, make our paper a faithful medium for the reports of spiritual meetings and lectures, the movements and methods of psychics, &c., we shall hold ourselves open to publish whatever may interest and benefit humanity. We shall endeavour to make the Golden Gate broad, liberal, charitable; guarding against the utterance of words calculated to wound the feelings of others. In this spirit we invite the co-operation of writers: no good comes of bitterness and uncharitableness." If the Golden Gate is conducted in this spirit it ought to be, and our hope is that it will be, well sustained. The editor informs us that there are several mediums in San Francisco for the independent slate-writing; through one, Mrs. Clara S. Reid, writings come in languages unknown to her, without the medium even touching the slates; through another, Mrs. Francis, the pencil is seen to write across the slate moved by unseen power.

THE "INDEPENDENT VOICE."

(From The Spiritual Offering.)

This is the title of a pamphlet of thirty-seven pages, by H. W. Boozer, of Grand Rapids, Mich., whom we have known as an earnest investigator for a quarter of a century. The medium of whom he writes has lived a considerable time at Grand Rapids, where her husband is a prosperous and respected citizen. She has an objection to her name being made public. She is approaching middle age, of medium height, rather stout, of a nervo-sanguine temperament. Until two years ago she was sceptical as to Spiritualism. Visiting then some friends, the amusement of table-turning was proposed, when they found they could get no turning without her hand being on the table. Subsequently it was found that it would move with only her hand being pointed at it; then that other objects in the room would move at her only pointing towards them. One evening, before lighting up, hands and arms were seen. The medium became interested, circles met at her house, and as time went on other manifestations occurred; at one, a year and-a-half ago, a large vase of flowers was carried, without bodily hands, to each member of a large circle for its perfume to be inhaled.

The medium, fatigued with frequent sittings, retired to the East for four months. On returning to Grand Rapids they took a smaller house, intentionally, to avoid séances. But friends importuned her to meet them at their own houses, and she has been kept exercising her mediumship ever since. The manifestations have been varied, but the most prominent one now is that of the "Independent Voice."

One of her controls is the spirit of an Aborigine, of whom the writer says, "The Indian seems to come to prepare the way for other spirits to communicate or prepare for fresh phenomena; that being done he takes leave of us." "The Aborigines," continues the author, "seem, by their constitution and habits in earthly life, to have become capable of imparting vital force to mediums, who recognise their influence as strengthening, healing, and helping."

The "Independent Voice" is heard in circles of any number under the conditions of absence of physical light; sometimes fifty are present, including sceptical inquirers. The medium takes a seat in the centre of the circle, which latter engages in singing until the voice is heard. This comes in front of one or other of the circle, two or three feet above the level of the floor. Some voices speak whisperingly, some with difficulty, others distinctly, loudly, and continuously, sometimes for half-an-hour. They are generally recognised by the names they use, their tones, and by what they say, which relates generally to what interested them when in the body; but they answer questions upon all subjects.

In this way an only child, a daughter, of Mr. and Mrs. Boozer, has frequently communicated with them, which seems to have added to Mr. Boozer's general interest in the mediumship of this lady.

He gives instances in his pamphlet of communications through the "Independent Voice."

"THE CARRIER DOVE," published at Oakland, California, has completed its second volume. From small beginnings the paper has become a large, twelve-page monthly, with a circulation that makes it self-sustaining. It is a welcome visitor to many a Spiritualist home.—The Golden Gate.

"THE GHOSTIC."—We have received the first number of this magazine from Oakland, California. It is edited and published by Mr. George Chainey, late secularist lecturer, assisted by Mrs. Anna Kimball. It proposes to discuss Spiritual and Occult topics. It is elegantly presented, with excellent typography. The first article is an eloquent lecture on "Walt Whitman," by the editor, who declares his sympathy with that remarkable poet in prose, backing his own by the published approbation of eminent thinkers in England and America. He claims Walt Whitman as a Spiritualist, giving quotations in proof from his "Leaves of Grass."

RELATIONS BETWEEN SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE:

MR. A. R. WALLACE AND R. M. N.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "SCIENTIFIC MATERIALISM."

"Any theory, hypothesis, philosophy, sect, creed, or institution that fears investigation openly manifests its own error."—ANDREW JACKSON DAVIS' Motto.

(From the Journal of Science, August and September, 1885.)

An article under this heading appeared in the Journal of Science, July, 1885, p. 400, by R.M.N.* From many passages I infer that R.M.N. does not, as many so-called scientists do, ignore the authentic facts of the so-called "Spiritualism"; the conclusions to which they lead are serious, not to say momentous. Supposing that the Spiritualistic theory be proved, there is this gain, viz., that the deviations from known natural laws witnessed by many thousands of credible persons result from the actions of the spirits of persons once existing in this world of life, and a logical answer to that most important question, the immortality of the soul of man (to use the word "soul" in its most comprehensive form), is given, and proves it without the possibility of question. If it be denied that the recorded facts result from the actions of disembodied spirits, then it must follow that, besides the phenomenal aspects of Nature, there is behind and within them an occult power tantamount to spiritual interposition. This would show that there is a world, beyond the world in which we live, inhabited by beings capable of suspending and counteracting those laws which we know as the laws of Nature. The facts, attested as they are by millions, cannot be ignored by any thinking mind. A mass of evidence is capable of being produced which is most overwhelming, and if adduced in any Court of Law, on questions of property or life, would make the verdict affirmative.

R.M.N. says: "Unwelcome as these facts may be to many of us, serious as are the conclusions to which they seem to lead, there is nothing to be gained, and possibly there may be much to be lost, by persisting in an attitude of blank sweeping denial." This, it must be admitted, is a fair statement, and it is much to be regretted that the prominent men of science, who assume to lead public opinion, have not fairly met the facts presented to their consideration. The treatment experienced by Dr. Slade, at the hands of Dr. Lankester and his coadjutor, was a gross persecution: subsequent events show that the acts of spirits (as he assumed) are far exceeded in the particular exemplification which he attempted.

It must be admitted that charlatanism is present at many séances; but this must be attributed rather to the wonder-mongers than to the mediums, who, in their desire to gratify the wonder-seeking crowd, have endeavoured to simulate the real facts in order that they might not go away disappointed. It is patent to frequent visitors of séances that the power which usually attends mediums is not only always present, or, if present, not always active. Mediums are but human, and it is easily to be understood that when impelled by their cupidity they are not always in that frame of quietude and passiveness which is absolutely necessary for the presentment of the manifestations. I may say that rarely convincing manifestations are obtained from a mixed class of paying attendants. This may be said, that any person really desiring proofs is seldom disappointed.

So far as my personal experience is concerned, the few presentments of which I have been a witness have led me conclusively to believe that there was an extra-mundane power active and present. I hesitate to say that what I witnessed was the work of spirits, but to what other occult power it is to be assigned I am at a loss to determine. One well-attested fact is as conclusive as a thousand: two I witnessed placed the matter, to my mind, beyond doubt.

First.—A letter lock, of eight letters, which had been purposely deranged, was opened by Mr. Conklin. The person who, after deranging the lock, wrote what he conceived to be the opening word, enclosed it in a sealed envelope, but which proved to be wrong in one letter. The lock was given to Mr. Conklin, the envelope delivered to persons who were appointed as judges. The solution given by Mr. Conklin was the correct word, and the lock was opened; the word written in the envelope failed to effect its purpose. The whole transaction was so arranged that it was impossible that there could be any tampering either with the envelope or lock.

Second.—I accidentally called upon Mr. Conklin; whilst with him two gentlemen inquired whether Mr. Conklin would grant them a sitting. They were introduced, and stated that they were strangers in New York and had just arrived; having heard of the Spiritual movement they were (if possible) desirous of testing it. Mr. Conklin acquiescing I rose to leave (fearing that the visitors might think there possibly might be collusion between myself and the medium). Mr. Conklin wished me to stay, the sitters joining in the request; I did so. The séance was arranged: one, the questioner, asked if it was necessary to frame the questions in English, or might he communicate in another language? Answer: the language was a matter of indifference; the answers would be in English. The tests were knocks and writing. The questions were framed, in number I think twelve. As they were written they were placed, one at a time, face downward, before Mr. Conklin: he, being apparently in a semi-somnolent state, wrote the answers in English, seriatim, as placed before him. The answers were stated by the questioner to be exact answers, and such as he should have expected in a ried roce conversation. The questions were written in Welsh, and addressed to his wife, who had been dead twenty years, with whom he wished to communicate. He stated his conviction that he had had communication with the spirit of his deceased wife, and that the questions were upon subjects known only to himself and to her.

I must apologise to the editor for presenting such matter for insertion in this journal. Viewed as a philosophy, or as an analysis of facts, all objection should be waived. The narratives are couched in the baldest form, and presented to show that by no possibility could they be supposed to be mere mind reading—the usual subterfuge of doubters. In the first case such an assumption would be ignored, the word enclosed in the envelope being incorrect; in the latter case Mr. Conklin was ignorant of Welsh, and it might almost be said of any other language, his diction when in his normal state being most irregular. He was almost uneducated, and had been a common sailor; but when under influence his language was free, and the words correctly spelt.

R. M. N. appears to think that the "new revelations" are mischievous in character, and by possibility will subvert every existing order of things, as he says—

"Cast on all things surest, brightest, best, Doubt, insecurity, and astonishment."

This is far from my idea, for they give an assurance and reality, much wanted, which no other manifestation could satisfy; they afford evidence of other intelligences than those existing in the world's life, and present almost tangibly those of a world to come. I quite agree with R. M. N. that there is much to learn and probably much to gain, and, further, that the scientific world has proved itself most unscientific in ignoring presentiments because they do not accord with the assumptions of the scientific mind. Whether Science and Spiritualism will ever harmonise there is much room to doubt. Science has its purview of phenomena with the rigid requirements of exact law; but of the inner movements of that interior something which all men possess, developed or undeveloped, of its laws they know nothing. The Christian Church has existed for nearly two thousand years, and finds the world more ignorant of and unbelieving in spiritual matters than it was on its institution. Exactly what occurred in the early Church was experienced in the spiritual movement. The Church contained an idealism which, rightly directed, would have advanced the human race. Spiritualism, on the other hand, without idealisation, without dogma, presents its array of facts which properly considered would lead to the same end. No, science and theology are both in arms. Science resists because there are no apparent laws by which the movement can be directed or controlled: Theology rejects the friend which would lead to the development of those truths of which it considers itself the patron and promoter.

If Spiritualism, or the manifestations so called, were isolated facts, and confined to one family or to one nation, a halt might be made; but when America, Europe, and Asia present the same evidences, it then becomes a common question.

Colonel Churchill, in his work on Mount Lebanon, under the head of "Magic," gives an account of some manifestations occurring there. The statement is evidently that of an eye-witness, or of one who had examined the evidences and satisfied himself as to the facts. He says (Vol. I., p. 164 et infra): "The son of Sheik Bechir is one of the best informed of the Druse Sheiks, and has acquired a store of history and literature which makes his conversation in every way superior. He has for some years devoted his time, singular as it may appear, to the cultivation of magic, and the stories he relates of his interviews with immaterial beings are novel and startling. At times he will place a jug between the hands of two persons sitting opposite to each other, when, after the recital of certain passages taken indiscriminately from the Koran and the Psalms of David, it will move spontaneously round to the astonishment of the holders. A stick at his bidding will proceed unaided from one end of the room to the other. A New Testament, suspended to a key by a piece of string, will in the same way turn violently round of itself. On two earthenware jugs being placed in opposite corners of the room, one being empty, the other filled with water, the empty jar will, on the recital of certain passages, move across the room; the jar full of water will rise of itself on the approach of its companion, and empty its contents into it, the latter returning to its place in the same manner as it came. An egg boiling in the saucepan will be seen to spring suddenly out of the water, and be carried to a considerable distance. A double-locked door will unlock itself. There cannot be a doubt that an unseen influence of some kind is called into operation, but of what nature those may conjecture who like to speculate on such matters."

"But it is in more serious cases of disease or lunacy that his supernaturally-derived powers are called into play. Previously to undertaking a cure he shuts himself up in a darkened room, and devotes his time to prayer and fasting. Fifteen and sometimes thirty days are passed in this state of abstinence and self-denial. At last one of the genii, described by him to be much of the same appearance as human beings, will suddenly appear before him and demand his bidding. He then states his position, and requires assistance in the case he is about to undertake. The genii replies at once that his request is granted, and encourages him to proceed." A lady who had been for more than two years afflicted with a swelling, which had long been mistaken for pregnancy, was cured by the passage of his hand over her person, "and in five minutes she arose perfectly cured." A confirmed lunatic was brought before him: "in two days he returned to his home perfectly cured."

The Sheik "maintains his intercourse with spiritual agents to be real and effective." "The belief in magic, and in the interposition of an order of unseen creatures in worldly affairs, at the bidding of those who choose to devote themselves earnestly to such intercourse, is universal throughout the entire population of every religion and sect."

"Instances could be multiplied in which most extraordinary and unaccountable results have been brought about by the intervention of individuals who make this communion the subject of their study and contemplation."

R. M. N. demands the same mode of investigation for spiritual facts as for phenomenal facts. He says Science is based on law, Spiritualism on will: supposing this to be the fact, is he in a position to state that this will is not restrained by law? Exactly what he claims for phenomenal manipulations the Spiritualists claim for their manifestations. He states that under certain circumstances Science can "foretell phenomena," and that wherever the experiment is made "the result comes out the same," and "that under the same conditions the same results will follow." We have then a qualification—"There are of course numbers of cases in which the causes and conditions of phenomena have not been traced out." Now this is, as I understand it, exactly the Spiritualist's position; they have numberless facts, phenomena if you will, but know of no law or mode for the classification of them, nor has ever the attempt been made to find a law or apply a classification. It has never been presented as a science, but merely as a succession of manifestations which appear to evade all scientific rules. Being so, it seems scarcely fair, except so far as the evidences of the facts, for Science to demand that the manifestations—which appear to subvert all scientific principles and to obey no scientific law—should be subjected to an exact formula. It should be remembered that the manifestations cannot be produced at will, as physical or chemical combinations may be, but are the result of peculiar conditions. Some of these conditions are widely spread, others but rarely occurring.

All Science has the right to demand is that the evidences of the facts are unimpeachable, and ought not to be greater—and ought not to be required to be greater—than those which would establish a case if presented before a legal tribunal. There should be no saying, after the investigation establishing the fact, that it is impossible because contrary to the so-called laws of science or of general experience.

Let Science fairly collect the facts (manifestations), give them fair treatment, and then, if it can, find the law by which they result. If, as surmised, the manifestations are supermundane in character, no secular law will fathom them. This, at least, may be said—that the manifestations have never subverted physical phenomena detrimentally, and have never intervened to produce social difficulties, and therefore they would appear to be amenable to some law of which those who witness the evidences are unconscious.

It is quite futile to talk of will in connection with the manifestations. A person might will for ever; unless the conditions were quite accordant and present he could not float in the air as Mr. Home and others have done.

At p. 403 R. M. N. cites many manifestations, but does not show that any evil has followed: it therefore follows, whatever be the power manifested, that it is subject to restraint. It will be quite time enough when any of the evils R. M. N. appears to anticipate occur, to ascertain "what are the limits of the powers of these 'spirits,' and under what conditions can they be exerted?"

He says "this question has its moral aspect." Ersted had in his mind a different class of manifestations to those termed Spiritual. The evil of witchcraft was not its spiritual aspect, but the malevolence and ignorance of uneducated or theologically superstitious people. Assumptions were made which in no case were verified, and many were the victims to the intolerance of public opinion. There is no similarity in the facts, and can be no evidence, moral or otherwise, for or against Spiritualism.

Persons of rank and education have witnessed manifestations, and have given evidence of the truth of the facts. Professor Hare in America, and Mr. Crookes in England, applied the most delicate tests, and proved (in what might be called the minor physical manifestations) that there was no possible trick in the presentiments they tested. What was the treatment they received? And then, in the face of such gross scandals, to talk of scientific investigations and other scientific, &c., is the merest irony.

As to the moral aspects of Spiritualism, so far as I have been able to trace the facts, they have had the purest and best results. I witnessed the phenomena in America, on its outbreak there. It is foreign to my purpose to enter into a defence of Spiritualism, to show the good it has done, and the benefits and blessings it scattered broadcast. I could state facts and name names where, in consequence of witnessing the manifestations, the characters of men have changed, and the result has been most beneficial. This much I may say: I have never known a person who became truly impressed by the spiritual idea who was not most radically improved in moral and social tone. At the same time it is not to be denied that charlatanism has entered largely into its precincts, and this is its difficulty: the same difficulty experienced by the Early Christians when base persons presented themselves as teachers, and cupidity (for means or rank) became its almost ruling passion. The sale of remedies, real or assumed, by professing spiritual mediums, and individual payment for séances, have wrought much of the mischief.

When R.M.N. talks of the harmony of Science and Spiritualism, and that it will "in the first place be necessary to discover the limits of the power of the spirits, under what conditions it is exerted, and how it may be combated when and where it may be undesirable," he will pardon me for saying that he has not given expression to much wisdom. Physical combinations and spiritual manifestations have nothing in common, and cannot be governed by the same class of laws, and therefore they can never harmonise. To his question of physical facts, wrought as it is said by spiritual agency, the only answer that can be given is the well-evidenced facts and the assumption that such results have been achieved by some supermundane agency. The simplest and most stupendous of the manifestations, the subversion or the apparent destruction of energy, tend to the same and only result—viz., that there are powers in the outer world of the laws of which men know nothing; that the manifestations of those powers are the proofs that the world life is not the only life of man; that beyond the death of the creature, the soul or spiritual energy of man has an existence, a power and a life, verifying Shakespeare's beautiful ideal—

"I gazed within the jaws of death and saw life teeming."

In conclusion, R. M. N. says: "My estimate of the visions of Swedenborg is founded on the fact that whilst he could furnish descriptions of planets known in his time, such as Jupiter or Saturn, he gives no hint of Uranus and Neptune. Had he done so his visions would have been completely freed from the stain of delusion and imposture."

If R. M. N. had happened on a work, "Nature's Divine Revelations," by Andrew Jackson Davis, he would never have penned the sentence italicised by me immediately above, for in that he would find the evidence in favour of spiritual seership which he pronounces would in his estimation have freed Swedenborg from "the stain of delusion and imposture."

Before the doctrine of Evolution was known in America so as to be familiar, I have heard Mr. Davis, in a state approaching trance, deliver many lectures on subjects setting forth the same theories and principles as those contained in Mr. Darwin's "Origin of Species." In his normal state Mr. Davis was not particularly intellectual; in his trance state a very different estimate would be given of him. The matter apropos to R. M. N.'s observation on Swedenborg's delusion was a spiritual communication given through Mr. Davis (March 15th and 16th, 1846), which applies to the planet Neptune, and was announced several months before its discovery by Professor Galle, of Berlin, in September, 1846. Science, of course, could know nothing of Mr. Davis' predictions: "The ninth planet (or cometary body), being composed of particles accumulated by the motion of the great sun, observed the same plane by the same specific force" ("Nature's Divine Revelations," p. 165). "The eighth planet" (Neptune)* was next evolved, observing the same principles of formation and the same general law of motion, and was situated

* From perturbations observed in the motions of the planet Uranus, it was supposed that they were occasioned by the presence of a planet beyond it. By the advice of Arago, Le Verrier was induced to investigate the subject of the motions of Uranus. Complete elements of the orbit of the unseen planet were finally deduced, making its longitude 325 deg., as seen from the earth in 1847. Adams, in 1845, attacked the same problem which Le Verrier took hold of two years later. In October, 1845, Adams communicated to Professor Airy elements of the planet so near the truth that, if a search had been made with a large telescope in the direction indicated, the planet could hardly have failed to be found. The Astronomer Royal was incredulous, and deferred his search for further explanations from Adams. The extraordinary circumstance is that no account was immediately published on the subject of Mr. Adams' labours. In the summer of 1846, Le Verrier's elements appeared. Observations of the planet as a star were actually made on August 4th, and again on August 12th; but the observations, owing to Mr. Challis' engagements, were not reduced—so the fact that the planet was observed did not appear. In September, 1846, Le Verrier wrote to Dr. Galle, at Berlin, suggesting that he should try to find the planet. On September 23rd, 1846, the planet was discovered. Later investigation showed that Lalande had observed the planet both on the 8th and 16th of May, 1795, but did not verify it as a planet. The planet Neptune presents the appearance of a perfectly round disk, about three inches in diameter, of a pale blue colour. No marking has been seen on it. A ring was suspected, but observation showed this suspicion to be without foundation. One satellite only has been discovered (vide Newcomb's "Popular Astronomy," p. 358 et infra). Uranus has (as recognised) two satellites; Herschel supposed he had discovered six, but this has not been confirmed. Professor Newcomb supposes there is a planet beyond Neptune; discovery has not yet rewarded his search.

in the orbit of the former merely because its composition was more dense than the first one evolved. . . . As the eighth and ninth planets have not yet been recognised as belonging to our solar system, there can be no conception of the original magnitude and diameter of the sun, as including its extended atmosphere" (Ib., p. 165). The density of the eighth planet "is four-fifths that of water." Its "atmosphere is exceedingly rare, containing but little oxygen, being composed chiefly of fluorine and nitrogen. It has, like Uranus, six satellites." (Ib., p. 167; et vide note, p. 169.)

Mr. Davis also, in his trance state, insisted on the identity of materials throughout the solar system. He says "that all matter and elements are fundamentally and essentially the same, and . . . a different law cannot govern any particle or element in the universe from that inherent law eternally established." This view as to identity of material in the sun and planets has since been confirmed by spectroscopic discovery. He also announced Faraday's discovery of Dia-Magnetism before it was familiarly known in America (vide p. 227, and an interesting note by Mr. Fishbough), and commented on its actions in Cosmic relations. Surely enough has been said to disabuse R.M.N.'s mind that revelations of mediums are not all delusions. The hostility of the scientific and theological world has much of the tone of the cry of the Jews, Can any good come from Nazareth? was there ever a prophet from Galilee?

Science in general deals with tangible phenomena, and because the scientist in his manipulations does not find a visible God, therefore the learned and would be all-knowing scientific theorists reject the interposition and idea of a God; hence arise Agnosticism and Materialism. Fortunately these observations have not universal application, for there are men of science great in achievement and grand in ideas. How men can dive beneath Cosmic realities and yet deny the designer it is difficult to understand, for the appreciation and confession of belief in the existence of God pledges to no theology, nor enchains the acceptor in the meshes of dogma.

In the investigation of phenomena there is always the presence of the unalterable law. If there be law, an institutor of that law must be assumed: this is a logic many are not equal to. In phenomena is found a sequence of effects induced by preceding causes, which sequences of causes predicate design, because from no concatenation of chances could order and uniformity result. It were quite as feasible and in point to deny the existence of mind because it cannot be put in a crucible and brought out a thought, as to deny design in Nature. When we look at a steam-engine and see the mighty results compassed,—the crushing power of the avalanche, or the tap gentle as the sighing of a zephyr,—no one thinks of the mind of the designer and the intelligence by which the almost living machine is produced, but without which none of the results witnessed could have been produced. So is it the theoretical scientist looks on so-called natural phenomena; he looks only to results. The designer of the steam-machine is known, and if inquired for he cannot be ignored, and the effects produced by the machine remain but effects. How small, indeed, when placed in contrast with the operations of Nature! It is indeed a poor logic which sees and profits by effects, and then denies the intelligence by which they were produced. Spiritualism discloses an occult power. What is its predicate, and where shall it stop?

The one result which the manifestations have produced (whatever more they may have done) is their proof of the existence of an occult world, at present beyond the reach of scientific investigation, of which the once denizens of this world are the inhabitants, and who have the power (regulated by certain conditions) of communication with beings of this life. The all (as I understand it) that Spiritualism claims to teach is the deathless life of the soul. Whatever other inferences its professors and believers please to draw from the manifestations are entirely matters for their own reason and faith. Spiritualism can no more harmonise with science than science can harmonise with religion, for each have separate domains and move in separate directions; the one is casual (science and theology), the other causal (morals and faith).

THE demands for proofs of a future life were never so pressing as at this present time. Our mediums, of whom we have many excellent ones here in San Francisco, inform us that their time is almost wholly occupied with earnest seekers after the truth, and some have more calls than they can attend to. And so the good work is progressing, not only in this city, but we believe throughout the State.—The Golden Gate.

The Harmony of Spiritualism and Science.
To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It was in no spirit of controversy that I took exceptions to Mr. A. R. Wallace's definition of Spirit, and it is only that the difference involved in our respective positions—and these positions are representative of two distinct schools of thought in Spiritualism—may be clearly understood, that I once more crave a share of your valuable space.

Mr. Wallace thinks I mistook his position regarding the nature of mind or spirit by confusing two distinct meanings, one referring to "mind in the abstract," or as a "fundamental principle," and the other as mind "individualised in the human form." Whenever Mr. Wallace can show that such a thing as "abstract mind" exists—and that would be equivalent to showing what it consists of—then I shall consider his point well taken, but not before. No, there was no confusion, but there was denial. "Abstract mind" exists no more than abstract matter exists. There can be no matter independent of its properties. It is the same with mind. Now what is the essential property or quality of mind? Obviously it is consciousness—awareness. To speak of it otherwise is to speak of it in terms of matter. Now, consciousness is only another term for egoism. Therefore, if the "abstract mind" of Mr. Wallace be anything not material, it must possess the attribute of consciousness, i.e., it must be egoistic, and matter lends nothing but the element of experience to the embodied spirit or soul. My position in a word is this: soul or spirit is. It embodies itself in matter for expression or experience. The result is a definite recognition in the consciousness of the spirit of what takes place in matter, and this recognition, this awareness, confined to itself, constitutes man—not the physical, but the spiritual man—the real man—the enduring man. Man does not become immortal. He is immortal, and this immortality is not by virtue of anything in matter, but because he is the output of that which is always in eternity, is never out of eternity; and the difference between man here and man there is, that here he views himself under time conditions, which exclude spirit, and there he views himself under eternal conditions, which is the realm of spirit. When man here transcends his experience, as sometimes happens under what we call abnormal conditions, through intuition or the superior state, it simply means that he has broken through that which constitutes himself as experience, and is permitted to participate in the larger and fuller and freer life of that which impelled him forth, created him, so to speak. Thus it is not mind or spirit, but experience that is evoked—to mind or spirit itself nothing is added, and never can be.

Spiritualists of the school of which Mr. Wallace is so distinguished a representative, cannot long avoid facing the philosophical position involved in their assumption that a time product can somehow be hocus-pocussed into eternity. So long as a future existence was itself the matter of contention, it was idle to speculate about anything beyond. But for Spiritualists this is now established—it is the main postulate of all their reasoning, and thus the inquiry is pushed into a field until now entirely unexplored. The theory I here set forth, permit me to say, is not evolved from my own inner consciousness. It is plainly and clearly taught by several of the spirit instruments now most prominently before the public; and since its acceptance is not barred on the score that it is not taught by spirits, it is happily in a position to rely for acceptance on its inherent logic and moral and philosophical necessity.

One point more: I controverted Mr. Wallace's position that "progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world is dependent on our higher moral feelings here," on the ground that it was a denial of justice or equality, because our moral nature as well as environment is largely imposed upon us. "But," says Mr. Wallace, "he does not say whether he accepts the alternative position, that all are to be at once good and happy in the future state, and that the most selfish, vicious, and sensual are to make equal progress with the benevolent, self-sacrificing, and virtuous." Why alternative? Why must all be at once both good and happy in order to controvert the theory that "progress towards a nobler and happier existence in the spiritual world is dependent on the cultivation of our moral feelings here"? I forbear to take advantage of what in all charity I must attribute to a laxity in statement, by which it is plainly made to appear that only such moral progress as is begun here can be continued there. Otherwise, how can it be dependent upon it? No, I will assume that what Mr. Wallace meant is that the ratio of progress is so dependent. But even this I assail on the score of its fixed and arbitrary injustice, because its assumption involves the unspiritual conclusion that the opportunities for bringing about a change of life for the better are far worse there than here. Yes, I do believe that under spiritual laws the difference is not one of goodness, so much as it is one of happiness. Even under earth conditions the greatest of sinners have been known to become saints in an hour—sudden and complete conversions are facts incontrovertible. Orthodox Christianity is discredited to-day because it refuses to extend the law of repentance, conversion, and salvation beyond the grave. Is Spiritualism doomed to fall into what is practically the same grave misconception of a higher and divine law? A converted man is a man in whom the spirit is awakened or born to outer consciousness. The spirit always makes for righteousness; and when rid of all false appearances, is it permissible for us to suppose that it will not move even more and more mightily along the line of repentance and conversion? But here let me observe a distinction not observed by Mr. Wallace. He employs goodness and happiness, as if they were always necessary correlates. A converted man is a good man now, but he is perhaps far from being a happy one. He is under repentance, but the shadow of his crimes still lingers about him, and as it is here, so I make no doubt, it will be there. Has not the translated individuality every incentive to progress—true spiritual progress—I mean, having its source in repentance, and shall it be denied him by some arbitrary law dependent on the limitations of matter or the accident of birth?

Facts or Fancies?

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—The Daily Telegraph, in a leading article of August 19th, theorises on the case of a sea-captain who was lately found in a small cave on a Welsh mountain, so mad that nothing could be got out of him to explain the cause of his dilemma; while there were plain proofs, from the testimony of his former neighbours, that his disease was that far too common one, religious mania. After a long tirade of hypotheses of a somewhat loose and ambiguous nature, the article comes to the conclusion that this poor maniac "fancied that he heard voices," adding, "half the unfortunate creatures in our madhouses fancy that they hear voices calling to them out of the void." Now what or where the writer means by "out of the void" is problematical, for "the void" is, like the air, somewhat of a "chartered libertine," as Shakespeare tells us, and may be here or there as well as anywhere, like the flies, of which the ancients called one Beelzebub the chief, for Beelzebub, etymologically considered, has that signification, not prince of lies, but of flies, though he may be both, notifying omnipresence only by numbers, not certainly in his own person, or omniscience either. Indeed, there is satire and contempt in the very term, quite different from the conception of some moderns; though vexatiousness and annoyance by numbers is strongly expressed by the term itself, as our noble soldiers just arrived from the Soudan can well understand, for verily his name is legion, though this is but the assertion of his myrmidons.

Now the writer of this article, if he be either a Jew or a Christian, has no right to assume that what he acknowledges has happened in former days, this "hearing voices," may not recur. He has read of it from the time of Eve downwards, up to a certain point where, without a shadow of reason, it suits him to stop—not the voices, by-the-bye, but the writer. Perhaps that writer is an Agnostic; if so, his ignorance should teach him silence; but if a Jew or a Christian, he knows also that, under the best auspices, the faculty of "hearing voices" did not necessarily bring with it all the virtues to those who possessed it; certainly not the Christian virtues of ruling well their own households, ruling well their own tempers, or a spirit of mercy towards those who offended them. The writer, too, has read, and in either case, as Jew or Christian, would profess to believe that evil spirits have been in the habit of speaking to those spirits in the flesh who have the ability of hearing them, throughout the ages. Why should this be fact then, and fancy now? Do we not hear, even now, of communication between the two worlds in every religion and every climate? Has nature changed in England only, that journalists and doctors should be thus inconsistent when it suits their fancy or perhaps their designs? And how is it that Spiritualists of the present day, among whom "hearing voices" is so common, do not go mad like other people? Can it be that they do not yield to the persuasions of designing spirits in or out of the flesh who tell them that facts are fancies, or fancies facts! Moreover, these intelligent people, the Spiritualists, are taught to let a little caution enter into their speculations, and even to fear fraud in their very inspirations, taking precautions against it, and thereby averting madness; precautions which it is to be predicated that others are not taught, for "hearing voices" is doubtless rather the cause of madness than the effect thereof.

Let me quote a well-known formulary on this point, printed weekly by Spiritualists for the guidance of their fellows: "Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has its accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason." Who knows, in the case of this poor maniac, supposing that he heard voices, whether his trust in great names did not lead to the abandonment of his reason?

Besides madness, what a heap of other evils arise from lacking such sound rules as I have quoted above. What happened to the late Mahdi by his following spirit counsel without a check? Why, he became a sensualist of the lowest order; four-and-twenty wives were the reward of his fancied sanctity before he left El Obeid. Moreover, beyond this, General Gordon says in his Journal, of October 31st, 1884, just published, p. 264, "The Mahdi has been taking women from others, which makes the Arabs doubt his holiness." Verily there be Nathans in every land! And so the common-sense of his very followers saw what his own converse with spirits could not show him. This happened when he had left El Obeid and was with his army near Khartoum. Unbounded licentiousness was the later vice of Mahomet himself, in the same way; and both died full of bloodthirstiness, war to the knife with all those who differed from them, no quarter, no mercy for the unbelievers, and all in the name of Allah!

Who doubts that the Sutte of India was caused by the inspiration of spirits; as well as the institution of whole sects, whose chief delight was taking the lives of their fellow men, both now happily exploded? I am a constant reader of the Daily Telegraph, and take clippings occasionally from it. In March, 1875, it tells us that, to please a certain "Goddess," thousands (in the region of Vizagapatam, halfway between Calcutta and Madras) were tortured to death; and it was not until 1836 that Colonel Campbell at length persuaded them to sacrifice beasts instead of men. They pray thus on that occasion: "Do not be angry with us, O Goddess, for giving you the blood of beasts instead of human blood, but vent your wrath on this gentleman." We do not hear that he was ever the worse for it.

So, in Africa, Sir Garnet Wolseley, in a despatch to Lord Kimberley, after the Ashantee war, when comparing the people of Coomassie, the capital of Ashantee, with those of Dahomy, says: "It may seem to be a horrid thing that a human being should be destroyed to propitiate an idol, or merely to bear some foolish message from a living to a dead savage, as in Dahomy. Still, here there is at least an object, a purpose in view, or the pretext of one, but in Ashantee there is nothing of the sort—that nation only kills for the sake of killing." I doubt much whether the sources of these murderous deeds are so very different as Sir Garnet applied to their action.

The above seem, now-a-days, extreme cases of what some spirits are still urging men to who put their trust in them; their thirst for blood seems as virulent as that of men in the midst of war. But spirits may have excuses that men have not, they may excite to manslaughter to get companions in their own state of living, or because they think it is a happier state.

There is one thing, however, still left to spirits in every country, the power of obsession, as probably this poor sea-captain may have found to his cost. Hereditary disease appears to be especially open to its attacks; and if it be true, as the faith-healers say, that sickness is sin, perhaps pre-natal sin, obsession in such a case appears to be like seeking like; and if it be true that evil spirits sometimes inhabit the diseased bodies of suffering humanity, it may also accrue that the nauseous medicines which often seem to cure or alleviate madness may be a means of driving off the inhabiting spirits, luxuriating as they do in diseased bodies, but not in nasty physis; so madmen of the present day have to thank the doctors for this, as well as for much kindness of treatment other ways, all except allowing them to assert that facts are not fancies, often irritating them thereby, and retarding their progress towards recovery.

It was a grand beginning when a ram caught by his horns in a thicket was used as a substitute for manslaughter. It was better still when that makeshift, the slaughter of beasts, was discarded. And since it is God Who has made us, and not we ourselves, we may hope for improvement more and more. And as God is, we believe, not only the cause of the existence of all spirits of every nature, as well as of men, but also their Preserver, or, as it has been otherwise worded, the Maker and Preserver of all things visible and invisible; and since God is, we believe, also without passions, we must look to God for the cure of so much still that seems anomalous in our being, while we inhabit, whether on earth or in fluidic life, this exceptionally material and weighty planet, and earnestly hope that He may, sooner or later, bring us to other regions where order and serenity are found, as we see it now in the course of the stars.

Baron Lazare Hellenbach.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—Should any of your German readers know of the present whereabouts of Baron Lazare Hellenbach, will they have the kindness to send his address, by telegram, to his daughter, the Countess H. Papadopoli Hellenbach, Semingasse, 5, Agram, Croatia, Austria, who will immediately refund the amount? I shall, furthermore, be indebted to them if they will kindly make any inquiries likely to lead to Baron Hellenbach being found without delay, and I trust the Continental Spiritual Press will be good enough to give publicity to this request.—Yours truly, G. Nottingham-place, W. W. EGLINTON.

SIR,—My absence from London has made it impossible for me to read proofs. I have felt pretty safe in leaving them unread, on account of the excellent quality of the proofs that I invariably get. But, from my hasty writing on a holiday tour, two errors have crept into my last article which I beg permission to correct.

On p. 412, third line from the bottom of first column, for "administrates" read "adumbrates"; and in the twenty-third line of the second column, for "sever" read "surer."—I am, &c., August 29th. "M.A. (Oxon)."

THE WORLD IS FULL OF BEAUTY.

By J. MASSEY.

There lives a voice within me, guest angel of my heart,
And its sweet lisps win me, till tears will often start.
Up evermore it springeth, like hidden melody,
And evermore it singeth this song of songs to me—
"This world is full of beauty, as other worlds above,
And, if we did our duty, it might be full of love."
Oh! God, what hosts are trampled amid this crush for gold;
What noble hearts are sapped of night—what spirits lose life's hold!
And yet, upon this God-blessed earth, there's space for every one;
Millions of acres wait theseed, and food rots in the sun.
Oh! "this world is full of beauty, as other worlds above,
And, if we did our duty, it might be full of love."
Let the grim halter perish, with cursed war's gory splendour;
And men shall learn to cherish thoughts both kind and tender.
If gold were not an idol—were mind and merit worth—
Oh! there might be a bridal between high heaven and earth!
For the leaf-tongues of the forest, the flower-slips of the sod,
The birds that hymn their raptures into the ears of God,
And the sweet wind that bringeth soft music from the sea,
Have each a voice that singeth this song of songs to me—
"This world is full of beauty, as other worlds above,
And, if we did our duty, it might be full of love."

"SCIENTIFIC ATTITUDE"—A PARABLE.

Mind in Nature is the title of a "Popular Monthly Journal of Psychical, Medical, and Scientific Information," published at Chicago. Its July number, the fifth, contains an article by A. N. Waterman, in which the position of certain prominent persons with regard to psychical subjects is criticised. The writer takes the attitude, generally, of the scientific and theological worlds as the text for a parable, of which the following is a free abridgment.

"Long ago, in a distant country, where expanses of water were few and far between, there were certain individuals who claimed to be able to float and propel themselves on the surface of water. The possibility of this was denied by the inhabitants of the dryer parts of the country: these deniers pointed to the essential difference between water and land, upon which men naturally moved; they insisted upon the well-known fact that the feet sink in water; they quoted the established practice of making bridges and boats, which proved that man had always required something more solid than water under him, citing, in further proof, recorded cases of drowning in water.

"Still the minority loudly declared that it was possible for man to float and swim, and adduced, in proof, not a little testimony of men having done so.

"To this testimony numerous theologians of the country demurred; they asked how all the people of the earth, save one family, could have been drowned, as it is recorded, if men could have swum; and whether it was likely that an All-wise Creator could have arranged the destruction of His creatures by drowning when he must have known that they could swim.

"The greater number of the men of science of the country declared, on their part, that the question could only be settled by experiments conducted by trained scientific observers; they held that the testimony of any others on such a subject was worthless, because ordinary persons are so easily deceived, neither had they the faculty of reporting with exactness what they saw, nor of distinguishing what they did see from what they imagined they saw. These men of science went to work by selecting subjects alleged to be able to float and swim; they stripped them in order to assure themselves that they had nothing floatable about their bodies; and, after washing them in alkaline solution to remove all floating oily matters from their skins, threw them into a pool. But the subjects rose to the surface, floated, swam to the bank, and contrived to get away from being further experimented upon.

"Then certain jugglers came forward, avowing the possibility of the subjects having floated by the aid of fine bladders in their mouths, armpits, and other parts, which bladders they inflated when in the water; and the jugglers suggested that, in the next experiments, the subjects' legs and arms should be bound and their mouths gagged. With other subjects this was accordingly done, and—sure enough—when they were thrown into the pool they did not rise and float.

"The majority then agreed, all round, that floating and swimming on the surface of water had been demonstrated to be only a piece of charlatanerie pretence.

"But this conclusion was by no means agreed to by the minority, who—protesting against this process of binding and gagging—still avowed their assured belief in the faculty.

"Then a final experiment was made. Some children were taken as subjects, so young that they could not hide and inflate bladders, however fine, and were thrown unbound into the pool. They not rising to the surface and floating, it was held to be demonstrated that floating and swimming were impossible to the human being; that no demonstration had ever been scientifically made of his ever having floated or swum; and that, in the reports of his having so done, he must have had the aid of bladders, or a board, or some other thing which buoyed him up.

"And this continues to be the conclusion on the subject with the majority in that country, to the present day."

MR. W. EGLINTON is now in London, and will resume his psychographic séances after Monday next.

DR. STREET and Dr. Mack ask attention to their change of address, which is now 18, Langham-street, W.

So large a colony of Japanese reside in Vienna, the Religio-Philosophical Journal says, that a Buddhist temple is to be erected for them. The furniture and decorations are to come from Japan.

WE are informed that Gerald Massey will leave New Zealand in the course of September for England, stopping, for several weeks in October, in California, during which time he will speak at the Metropolitan Temple.—The Golden Gate.

TRANSITION.—It is with extreme regret that we learn of the passing away, on the 5th inst., of Mr. A. L. Elder, of Campden House, Kensington, and St. Helen's-place, E.C. Mr. Elder was a Spiritualist of long-standing and a generous supporter of Research. Our literature owes not a little to his kindly fostering care.

WALWORTH ASSOCIATION OF SPIRITUALISTS, 43, MAJOR-place-Walworth-road.—On Sunday evening the 13th inst. the meeting place of this society will be re-opened at seven o'clock, when the first of three addresses on Spiritualism will be delivered by Mr. James Veitch entitled, "Spiritualism: its Teachings." On the two following Sundays he will speak on "Spiritualism: its Evidence," and "Spiritualism: its History." The committee hope that they will be favoured by a good attendance at this the inauguration meeting of our winter session.

MISS ROSAMOND DALE OWEN, the talented daughter of Robert Dale Owen, who is as enthusiastic a defender of the truth of Modern Spiritualism as was her illustrious father, has not long returned from England, where she had a brief but conspicuous career as a lecturer. After necessary rest and recuperation, she intends, it is announced, to resume her work on the rostrum in behalf of the cause so dear to her father's heart. It is hoped that she may visit the Pacific Coast.—The Golden Gate.

DR. JOHNSON in his "Rasselas" puts the following words into the mouth of one of his characters:—"That the dead are seen no more, I will not undertake to maintain against the concurrent and unvaried testimony of all ages and of all nations. There is no people, rude or learned, among whom apparitions of the dead are not related and believed. This opinion, which perhaps prevails as far as human nature is diffused, could become universal only by its truth: those that never heard of one another would not have agreed in a tale which nothing but experience can make credible. That it is doubted by single cavillers can very little weaken the general evidence, and some who deny it with their tongues confess it by their fears."

By EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

The effects of mediumistic nerve force are particularly striking in cases where there is a quick alternation of attraction and repulsion, of stronger and weaker pressure on the object, or of points impressed, as in the motions of a bow over the strings of an instrument, or in the alternate depressions of the keys of an accordion or piano, or in the guidance of a writing pencil upon a surface.* What first in these phenomena we have at present to abide by, is that they usually only occur in a circle when the chain is closed, and the playing of the accordion, as the audible writing of the pencil, immediately pauses when and as long as the chain is broken by detachment of the hand of one of the party. From this it is to be understood, not only that all the party, by being charged with mediumistic nerve force, co-operate in the phenomenon, but that they co-operate in it in a way differently regulated by the medium from moment to moment. For the charging of each remains at first unaltered, even if the chain is broken; but the changing innervation impulses, by which the medium is altering at every moment the distribution of the force, lose by the interruption of the chain their path of conduction, and thereby their operation. If a closed slate, with a fragment of pencil inside, lies on the table or on the lap of one of the party, or is held by two of them, one has to represent to oneself a system of lines of attractive force, comparable to a radial net of tense elastic cords (Gummischlaufen), which on the one side all converge upon the bit of pencil, and on the other side conduct through the chain of sitters to the middle brain of the medium as to their central spot, from which alternately now one, now others of these threads are drawn sharper.

If individual strong mediums elicit the writing at a distance for themselves alone, in order thus to obtain instructions from their somnambulant consciousness for their direction, it is to be supposed that the different parts of the medium's body, his hand holding the slate, but especially the table beneath which the slate is pressed and on which the other hand is laid, supply the place of the chain otherwise formed from a number of organisms, and likewise afford sufficient points of support for the derivation of a system of concentric lines of force.

Our ordinary writing itself, by muscular movements of the hand, depends on a similar system of push and pull lines of force, with different points of support which are peripherally distributed about the pencil; but here the push and pull are conveyed by material contact, while in the slate-writing without contact both act from a distance. Even in ordinary writing our consciousness overleaps the feeling of intermediates, and projects its writing-feeling into the point of the pencil; this must also, according to psychological analogies, be the case for the feeling of the somnambulant consciousness in the writing at a distance. The somnambulant consciousness having once accustomed itself to mediate writing by a system of push and pull lines of mediumistic nerve force, the course of this innervation impulse is as easy as the analogous course of the other sort of innervation impulse in writing by involuntary muscular movements, and therefore it is not surprising that the writing at a distance succeeds just as quickly, delivering the like strokes as those of the involuntary somnambulant writing with the hand. The kind of innervation impulse must of course be different in the muscular mediation of it and in that by mediumistic nerve force, but the rhythm in the alternation of this impulse must be in both cases the same. It may, therefore, be safely asserted, that a medium must bring practice in this rhythmical alternation of the writing impulse if he will be proficient in the writing at a distance; that is, only a medium who has learned to write will be able to produce involuntary writing or that at a distance. But even a medium versed in writing must first accustom himself to the kind of innervation impulse requisite for the writing at a distance, and to the command of it; and, therefore, is it that the early attempts are so illegible, unsymmetrical, crooked, and awry, as would be the case, suppose, with the first attempt to write with the foot.*

Already the mediumistic luminous phenomena exhibit definite forms, yet these are rather crystalline or still inorganic forms, as crosses, stars, a bright field with glimmering points of light, more resembling electric dust figures or Chladni sound figures than organic forms. In the writing at a distance, on the other hand, must already be admitted a system of push and pull lines, analogous to that which acts on the hand grasping a pencil in writing. Now, if we suppose such a system of push and pull lines of the nerve force acting at a distance to act, not on a hard slate-pencil, but on a stump of soft wax of the same form and size, this must exhibit the like bendings and impressions as if a human hand had attempted the same writing with a soft wax stylus.

Suppose another arrangement of the push and pull lines of mediumistic nerve force, corresponding to those relations of pressure produced by the interior of a hand stretched out flat upon an impressionable substance, then must the displacement of parts, resulting from such a dynamical system, again agree with that produced by the pressure of the hand; that is, must show the impression of an organic form, without an organic form having been materially there producing this impression. Since the dynamical effects of the mediumistic nerve force, like those of magnetism, penetrate unhindered every sort of matter, no material closures of impressionable surfaces could present even a difficulty to the production of such impressions. This is also in fact the case, according to Zöllner's experiments with Slade, repeated by others with private mediums. (Ps. St. VII., p. 387, 388.) Zöllner says that he distinctly felt the double slate twice strongly pressed against the upper part of his thigh, on which it was lying; now as impressions were found on both the interior sides, for the one impression the system of lines of force must have pressed upon the slate; for the other impression, the slate must have been pressed or drawn against the system of lines of force.

Were it a case of actually materialised limbs, invisible to those present, the penetration of the enclosing material, or cover, would indeed be possible according to Spiritistic views, but would require an incomparably greater development of force than the impression on an open slate; the facility and rapidity with which these impressions were obtained are as much opposed to this view, as is the fact that the impressionable lid was left intact by the push and pull lines acting through it. If materialised limbs penetrated the upper slate, the layer of soot on the inner side of that slate (if not the paper on which it was spread) must have been torn away by the foot-soles penetrating the slate; that this did not happen, that no impression of the edge of the foot, intercepted by the upper slate, was visible in the soot-layer of the latter, and that this soot-layer remained wholly intact in the process, is a sure proof that the dynamical actions are limited to the impression of definite surfaces, that the system of force lines in question is directed only to those surface impressions, that thus, in other words, in this case, the dynamical analogue is not that of a foot, but only of a foot-sole, i.e., of a surface without corporeity behind it.

As the question is only of a system of lines of force with different strengths of push (of pull, if the back of the slate is turned to the medium), there is also no reason why the impressions obtained should resemble the limbs of the medium, for that which prescribes the arrangement of the lines of force is simply phantasy in the somnambulant consciousness of the medium, which can deviate at pleasure from the latter's own bodily configurations. So the impressions obtained represent limbs of the most different size and shape; a direct impressing of the medium's own limbs appears wholly excluded, quite apart from particular experimental arrangements, in the case, for example, of the impression of a child's foot.

Thus impressions of organic forms, as they cannot, like writing, have arisen by successive, but only by simultaneous formation, are among the most striking phenomena of the whole province, only surpassed, perhaps, by the instances of a penetration of matter. It is the more important inasmuch as their durable results, the impressions obtained, like the writing obtained, afford indubitable proof that in these two cases we have not to do with the transfer of hallucinations, but with objective operations of the medium's energy upon matter.

Even those who adopt the view that the pressures are of invisible materialised limbs, must still admit that these invisible members are then to be conceived only as real projections of the medium's somnambulant phantasy, that is, that their matter is borrowed from the bodily material of the medium, their form is occasioned and conditioned by the medium's somnambulant phantasy, and their effectuation by the medium's unconscious willing. Thus even were they to be regarded as material outgrowths from the organism of the medium, still they would be nothing further than exclusive products of the medium, to be explained by the co-operation of his unconscious willing, his unconscious phantasy, and his bodily organism. And the same would be the case, should it be supposed that in the writing at a distance an invisible material hand mediated the forces of push and pull by which the pencil is urged; such a hand also would then be nothing more than an efflorescence of the medium.

Since, moreover, such a supposition does not at all facilitate the physical explanation of the phenomena, only adding to the invisible system of push and pull forces the superfluous hypothesis of a formed, invisible, and intangible matter, it has no scientific justification, and seems to be only the involuntary psychological product of a cleaving to sensible representation.*

Finally, there remains to be mentioned the influence of the nerve force on living organisms. That sensitive plants can be hypnotised by magnetic passes of the hand is sufficiently established;† the same is true of animals, sleeping people, children, and savages, all of whom have no notion of what has been done with them. It is not at all necessary that passes with the hands, or motions with the arms, should be made; these are only aids to the transmission of the nerve force, as are, likewise, breathing upon, or fixed gaze, none of them being at all indispensable to its out-streaming or out-beaming. As little as it is necessary for a medium to charge by magnetic passes the objects to be moved, so little is this requisite in the case of a person to be hypnotised; strong magnetisers fascinate sensitives without any mediating action, and by their mere wills place them in a manifest or masked somnambulism which paralyses

* The few reports which speak of the writing of a visible spirit hand are of no weight, as they refer to dark sittings, in which the shadowy outline of a hand on self-luminous paper is said to have been indistinctly seen.—Owen: "Debatable Land."

† The furtherance of plant-growth, which is ascribed by the Indians to the mediumistic force, I mention only by the way, because I am not aware that this phenomenon has been observed in the presence of European and American mediums as a genuine process and one applicable to all stages of development. We know, however, that the physiological functions of vegetable life can be powerfully excited, as well by super-refrangible rays as by electricity and by chemical stimulants (spirit, camphor), that even in mankind a four-year-old boy can exceptionally have attained the development of a man of thirty, and that the growth of certain quick-growing vegetable germs can be artificially accelerated. Accordingly it seems well conceivable that the mediumistic force also is such a stimulant.

their conscious will, and in its stead subjects the functioning somnambulant consciousness to the will of the magnetiser.* On the other hand it is not the mere will of the magnetiser as such which elicits these phenomena in others by a pure psychical influence, any more than it is the mere will of the medium that, by a pure psychical influence, produces the physical phenomena referred to in inanimate objects; but in both cases the immediate action of the will is only to disengage magnetic or mediumistic nerve force from the nervous system, and to radiate it definitely upon living or dead objects.

This liberation and directive radiation of nerve force is under all circumstances, no matter whether the first impulse proceeds from the will of the waking consciousness, or from the unconscious will of the somnambulant consciousness, not a function of those parts of the brain which serve as support to the conscious will, but of deeper-lying layers of the brain which either coincide with those supporting the somnambulant consciousness, or are more approximate to them than to the first. It is, therefore, no wonder that the development of magnetic-mediumistic nerve force is stronger in the somnambulant than in the waking state, and that persons who in the latter have no power of magnetising others, develop it in somnambulism in a high degree. This accounts for the fact that mediums first evolve sufficient nerve force for the production of physical phenomena when they have entered the state of a masked somnambulism, and that especially straining and difficult phenomena are only produced when the masked somnambulism has passed into complete somnambulism; that is, when the waking consciousness and the reflex-prohibitions of the brain parts supporting it have quite desisted, and the collective vital energy of the nervous system has concentrated itself in the brain parts supporting the somnambulant consciousness.

As certainly as mediums in their masked or manifest somnambulism have the disposal of an amount of nerve force, be it self-produced or be it extracted and collected from the others present, such as no magnetiser in the complete waking state has ever developed, so certainly also must their power, by means of this surpassing quantity of force, to place the spectators in a condition of open or masked somnambulism, be greater than that of any magnetiser operating in the waking state. It is a common phenomenon at mediumistic sittings for sensitive members of them to fall into swoons, convulsions, trance, ecstasy or hypnosis, and these phenomena would be much more frequent if the mediums had an interest in them, and therefore sought to motive their unconscious wills to elicit them. Mediums, however, have just the contrary interest, opposed to the occurrence of open somnambulism among the spectators, because this has usually a disturbing effect, being often accompanied by convulsions and the like, which divert the attention of the rest from them and their performances, and they may find in the new somnambles competing mediums who may arbitrarily counteract their dispositions of the nerve force present in the circle.

On the other hand, mediums may well have an interest in eliciting a masked somnambulism in the party collectively to the degree that they are thus made susceptible to the transference of hallucinations, without becoming at the same time qualified for active competition with the medium. This interest and the nature of its motivation need not, of course, occur to the consciousness of mediums. But when it is considered that a somnambulant medium has hallucinations which he takes for reality, and has at the same time the lively wish that the spectators should perceive the same supposed reality, that is, have the same (hallucinatory) representations as himself, evidently we have given in the medium all sufficient psychological conditions to compel him to an unconscious influencing of the spectators, in the sense that they are placed in a condition favourable to the arising of like representations (i.e., to the infection of hallucinations), which is just the condition of masked somnambulism.

* I was told in a private letter of a strolling tinker, of demoniacal aspect, who added to his earnings by inducing in women the illusion that their kettles had holes in them, and pretending to repair them.

Now since already, in masked somnambulism, mediums are actually subject to hallucinations of all sorts, usually without knowing them as such; since, in open somnambulism, they are wholly possessed by them; since, further, on account of their vocation, and from considerations of business, they, in fact, wish that the reality recognised by them of such purely subjective phenomena should also be recognised by those present; it would be inexplicable if, with the combination of conditions so favourable, the instatement of masked somnambulism in the assembled party, with frequent infection of the medium's hallucinations, did not occur.

If, in Spiritistic circles, these facts have yet not been at all remarked and regarded, that is because the concern has been only on behalf of the objective reality of all phenomena, so that such an observation from another quarter exasperates, and is rejected as a sacrilege. From the scientific psychological standpoint, on the other hand, every participant in mediumistic sittings must constantly regard himself as under the influence of a very strong magnetiser, whose unconscious interest it is to place him in masked somnambulism, for infection of hallucinations, and must consider that this influence is the more powerful the oftener he has frequented mediumistic sittings, and the oftener he has sat with the same medium. He must say to himself that this state of a masked somnambulism is announced to his own waking consciousness by no direct symptom, but only by the capacity for being infected by the representations, especially the sensations, and quite particularly the hallucinations of the magnetiser (here the medium), and must be the more prepared for implanted hallucinations, the longer he occupies himself practically with the subject.

We shall see later on how extensively this transference of hallucinations actually takes place at mediumistic sittings; at present we are only establishing the fact, that in a circle of similar composition, throughout a long series of sittings, the most favourable conditions conceivable are afforded for elicitation of a masked somnambulism even in non-sensitive persons.

GERMANY has a new Spiritualist paper, Spiritische Wochenblatt, published at Rostock.

THERE is nothing which so helps us to feel that our life has been worth living as the thought that we have helped another soul to fulfil its earthly destiny. For this consolation the dying miser would probably give all his gold could he but get a reprieve from death.

PSYCHOGRAPHIC MEDIUMSHIP.—In San Francisco, at 100, Sixth-street, now resides a young man under twenty, Mr. Fred. Evans, in the family of Mr. and Mrs. Hance, whose daughter is a test medium. Mr. Evans is a medium for the slate-writing. The writer, with his wife, attended one of their sittings last Sunday evening. There were fifteen present. Two slates were, by a committee, of which the writer was one, cleaned, bound together with some bits of pencil between, and then sealed. The writer put on each slate a private mark. The committee laid their hands, with those of Mr. Evans and Miss Hance, on the bound slates, and soon sounds were heard as of the bits of pencil fluttering between them. Mr. Evans then held them successively on the shoulder of each member of the circle. Writing was heard to come to all except two. On unsealing and separating the slates, which bore the writer's private mark, messages were found, addressed to the writer and to eleven others; the messages were generally in the handwriting of the persons, when in the body, whose signatures were appended. Some of the messages were in very minute writing. Here was a test of independent direct writing of the same kind as those recorded by the German Professor Zöllner as occurring in the presence of Slade. When will science explain the marvellous phenomenon!—The Golden Gate.

By S. EADON, M.D.

V.

THE ARTESIAN WELL OF CHICAGO.

Chicago, as is well known, is one of the most go-a-head cities in the world. Like Jonah's gourd, it appeared to spring up in a night. Its population rapidly increased; and water soon became a sine quâ non, both as regards use and luxury. Science was at fault; for geologists had pronounced that there could be no water beneath such a stratum. Top water was all that could be looked for, and presently a water company was formed to supply this impure kind of liquid.

There happened to live, at this time, in Chicago, a person named Abraham James, a simple-minded man, of Quaker descent, uneducated, and, in fact, quite an ignorant person. It was discovered by a Mrs. Caroline Jordan that James was a natural clairvoyant, in fact, a medium, and that he had declared, when put into the trance condition, that both water and petroleum, in large quantities, would be found, in a certain tract of land, in the neighbourhood of the city. For a long time no attention was paid to his statements. At length two gentlemen from Maine, called Whitehead and Scott, coming to Chicago on business, and hearing what had been said by Abraham James, took him to the land where he said water could be had in immense quantities by boring for it. Being entranced, James at once pointed out the very spot. He told them that he not only saw the water, but could trace its source from the Rocky Mountains, 2,000 miles away, to the spot on which they stood, and could sketch out, on maps, the strata and caverns through which it ran. Negotiations were at once entered into for the purchase of the land, and the work of boring was commenced. This was in February, 1864, and the process went on daily till November, when, having reached a depth of 711 feet, water was struck, and flowed up at once at the rate of 600,000 gallons every twenty-four hours.

The borings showed the following kinds of strata passed through by the drill, and this was spiritually seen and described by the clairvoyant, as practical proofs to the senses of other people. First the drill passed through alluvium soil, 100 feet; limestone, saturated with oil, thirty-five feet, which would burn as well as any coal. Joliet marble, 100 feet; conglomerate strata of sand and flint mixed with iron pyrite and traces of copper, 125 feet; rock (shale) saturated with petroleum, the sediment coming up like putty, thick and greasy, 156 feet; galena limestone was next reached at a depth of 539 feet; a bed of limestone, containing flint and sulphuret of iron, was next bored through, the depth being 639 feet, and being very hard, the work went on slowly. At this point there appeared a constant commotion, arising from the escape of gas, the water suddenly falling from thirty to sixty feet, and then, as suddenly rising to the surface, carrying with it chippings from the drill, and other matters. The work still went on, when at the depth of 711 feet the arch of the rock was penetrated, and the water suddenly burst forth from a bore 4½ in. at the bottom, of a temperature of 58° F., clear as crystal, pure as diamond, and perfectly free from every kind of animal and vegetable matter; and which, for drinking purposes and health, is found to be much better adapted than any water yet known, and will turn out to be the poor man's friend for all time to come.

Here then is a huge fact for the faithless; a fact brought to light by dynamic or invisible agency, and which no power of negation can gainsay. Natural science said no water could be found; but psychology said, False! for I will point out the spot where it will flow in splendid streams as long as the earth spins on its axis. Since 1864 the Artesian well of Chicago has poured forth water at the rate of a million and a half gallons daily; and what is economic, to say nothing of Yankee shrewdness, it is flowed into ponds or reservoirs, which, in winter, freeze, producing 40,000 tons of ice for sale, and which might be quadrupled at any time.

What will science say to this cui bono matter of fact? What, those super-wise people who, with finger on lip, moon about, and whimper, and cry out, What's the good of the dynamic and the invisible? Is there no good in finding, by spirit agency, a living fountain of pure water for the use of millions of human beings for ever? Is it not a mighty boon for the humanity of that part of the earth? Verily it is; and the source of knowledge was a communication from disembodied spirits in spirit life.

Let us now turn more particularly to the man—Abraham James—by whom, and through whose mediumship, this discovery was brought about. He was of Quaker origin; without schooling; ignorant of any language but his own—English—simple-minded, upright, truthful, honest, ignorant as a clodpole. Of drawing he knew nothing; and as to science, he could not tell a triangle from a parallelogram; and as to their properties and relations, he was in profound ignorance. Yet this same man, Abraham James, when in the trance state, can lecture on geology, chemistry, medicine, astronomy, the philosophy of life, and on any branch of physical and natural science, and that, too, with such knowledge and eloquence as few sacans can equal.

Although English is the only tongue he knows, yet in the trance state he speaks French, Italian, Spanish, German, and an Indian language, of each of which he knows nothing in his natural or normal condition.

Abraham James never received a lesson on drawing in his life, yet, in his trance condition, his drawings of the formation and stratification of the earth's crust are marvellous productions. He drew a series of diagrams, which traced the Artesian well at Chicago from its source to its outlet or fountain head. This picture, when put together, is composed of six sheets of drawing paper twenty-six inches by forty inches each, and was done in sixty hours—a piece of work which would have taken any ordinary artist sixty weeks, in his ordinary condition!

It matters not to Abraham James, when at work, whether it is light or dark. He generally uses from one to six different kinds of pencils, sometimes using one hand, and sometimes both hands at the same time, the fingers moving with a rapidity which often troubles the eye of the beholder to follow. Whether in light or in dark; with eyes bandaged or not; with a piece of paper held between his face and the picture, it matters not, the work goes on. What he sees with his spiritual eye, in the interior of the earth, he can delineate on paper with perfect accuracy. Speaking of the drawings of Abraham James, a writer who has seen them says: "The floors of some of these caverns were composed of great masses of some of the most beautiful shells, which in their shadings and perfections are evidently the work of a master hand. The elaborate character of the shell work which runs through all these geological pictures, the millions of accurate pencil strokes necessary to complete them, and the very short time in which they were executed, are matters of great astonishment and wonder to all who have seen them."

In the trance state, Abraham James drew a full-length portrait of the martyred President Lincoln on sheets of paper 7½ feet long by 4½ feet wide. The President is represented life-size, standing upon a rock, the broken chain of African slavery beneath his feet, and in his left hand, the scroll of American Liberty. This picture was completed in the medium state in twenty-four hours, and is a remarkable production even amongst the other marvellous efforts of this trance artist. Whence comes this skill? The human spirit acts without the ordinary instruments of the senses; "Suns teeth, sans eyes, sans mouth, sans everything," and yet the work goes on in light or in dark with almost lightning speed till the picture is completed.

ON MAGNETIC HEALING.

By BERNARD RAGGAZZI

(Editor of Le Journal du Magnétisme, Geneva).

II.

One might think that those who devoted themselves to the study of a subject of such importance to humanity would have had encouragement from those who made the healing art their vocation; but no! the majority of these have displayed only hostility towards them. This hostility engendered bitterness and anger. But let magnetism have charity; the love of doing good should alone rule in them, as it did in their Divine Master. They who would perfect themselves will follow His example as closely as they can.

In the application of the human magnetic force to the restoration of health let it be ever kept in mind that "It is the Spirit that giveth life." Premising that I do not magnetise unless I am in good health, and that I cease operating at the first intimation of fatigue, I state my simple method of proceeding. First, I lay my hands calmly, and with earnest prayer to do good, upon the suffering part of my sick brother; I let my heart go forth in sympathy with him. Doing thus I have sometimes had to rejoice at an instantaneous cure—a cure without any further proceeding. But such cases have been exceptional; generally I have to continue. The most influenceable parts of the body are the head and the epigastrium; from the head I make slow, more or less energetic, passes with my hands, without contact, to the epigastrium. After a time, short or longer, the patient may speak of an uneasiness in one or other of these parts; in the head, perhaps, of heat, heaviness, and then sleepiness; in the epigastrium of heat and stifling; then I extend my passes from them downwards to the hands and to the feet; by these equilibrium is established, and the uneasiness disappears. The same result may follow from breathing strongly, and with concentration, upon the part affected, and then making transverse passes from the part and outwardly. In these operations the magnetic fluid is accumulated upon the principal seat of the malady, and the surplus is thrown off.

The experience of practised magnetisers may be a guide as to which of these, or other processes, should be observed, and how long and often they should be continued; but I trust much to my own intuitive feeling, the feeling which seems to develop itself in the sensitive by unselfish brotherly love. The brotherly love which our Divine Master taught by word and example will teach us well the mode or process most suitable for treating severe cases.*

There are processes of manipulation with the finger-points, of rubbing and kneading with the hands, in cold congestion and chronic pains, which processes aid in rousing vitality and quickening circulation. There are the breathings, insufflations, already spoken of, the warm in deep-seated local pains, and the cold in hot congestions. Any of these processes may seem sometimes to intensify existing pains. This, however, generally denotes aroused effort of nature to be calmly sustained; but the patient should not be left until such intensification has passed off: the magnetiser's presence will sustain him.

You will be sure to read and confer with others upon the subject of your studies and practice, but accept nothing without good scrutiny. Men, ignorant of causes, are prone to misinterpret and exaggerate. Of all books I commend those of Dupôtet; no writer has understood the subject better than he.†

From every individual there radiates an aura, agreeable and salutiferous, or the reverse. The odour of the rose refreshes, that of the poppy stupifies. The radiations of some individuals are repellant, may even be injurious. The calm, cheerful, benevolent man diffuses around him a corresponding moral atmosphere, while that diffused by another, under the influence of low passions, excites uneasiness.

Reflect well upon the truth that the soul radiates an atmosphere which affects and modifies the state of the beings they come in contact with, and you will comprehend that in the treatment of the sick, the psychical and moral dispositions of him who operates magnetically play an important part.

To excel in healing, prayer is a potent means: if the soul is exalted in faith and brotherly love, it can perform marvels. Witness the works recorded of the great healers of all times.

EIGHT-FOLD FULFILMENT OF A PROPHECY.

The Times, discussing the question, Are there two Earls of Mar? narrates a remarkable fulfilment of an ancient prophecy, pronounced 320 years ago, and alluding to no less than eight events connected with the Earldom of Mar. The details are thus given:—

It was in consequence of an Earl of Mar having taken the stones of Cambuskenneth Abbey to build a castle in the town of Stirling, which was very distasteful to the inhabitants, that this prophecy appeared, to the following effect—viz., that "Mar's work," as it was called, would never be completed. It still stands unfinished. That "horses should be stabled in thy hall, that a weaver should throw his shuttle in thy chamber of state." In the beginning of this century, upon an alarm of the French invasion, a troop of 30 horses was stabled in the ruined hall of Alloa (the family place), and a weaver, unable to pay his rent, set up his loom in the state chamber. That "the dwelling in which a king was nursed shall be burnt, that thy children shall be born blind, yet shall thine ancient tower stand, for the brave and true cannot be wholly forsaken." In 1801 Alloa Tower, which had been the abode of James VI. as an infant, was burnt, and several of the family of Mar have been born blind, but possessing beautiful eyes, notably the present Lord Mar's great aunt, Lady Jane Erskine, and Henry David Erskine, who died in 1848. That "an ash sapling shall spring from the topmost stone of the ancient tower," which was seen there between 1815 and 1820, and "then shall thy sorrows be ended, that the sunshine of royalty shall beam on thee once more, thine honours shall be doubled, the kiss of peace shall be given to thy countess, the days of peace shall return to thee and thine, the line shall be broken, but not until its honours are doubled and its doom is ended." The course of events has completely fulfilled the prophecy, for the sunshine of royalty has for the third time beamed on the ancient earldom—first when Mary Queen of Scots, in consequence of the usurpation of it by the Crown, restored it to its rightful possessor in 1565; secondly, when George IV. restored it from its attainder in 1824; and thirdly, when Queen Victoria restored the rights and privileges of the present Earl of Mar—in 1885, in consequence of a new and hitherto unrecorded title of Mar—assumed to have been created by Mary Queen of Scots in 1565, and adjudged by the House of Lords in 1875 in favour of the Earl of Kellie, but leaving untouched the ancient earldom—having had the effect of unjustly depriving the inheritor of the ancient dignity of his rights and privileges as a Scotch peer. It was also in consequence of no less than 104 peers having respectfully petitioned the Queen in favour of the rights of the inheritor of the ancient earldom that an Act of Parliament, introduced by her Majesty's command, has been recently passed, after a searching inquiry into the pedigree and descent of the present Earl, from Gratney, Earl of Mar, and his wife, the sister of King Robert the Bruce, to the present time—an inquiry by which it was established that this time-honoured earldom was still in existence, and had never been extinct. This act of gracious intervention of the Queen has thus become the means of completing the fulfilment of the various warnings given in this remarkable prophecy and "doubling the honours of Mar."

RACES differ in spiritual gifts as they do in colour, stature, or other exterior quality. Among some, seership prevails; among others, mediumship. Some peoples are given to sorcery, transmitting the rules for its practice from generation to generation, enabling them to exhibit special ranges of psychical phenomena. Occult knowledge is unholy or holy according to its application to purposes of self or to purposes of good to the neighbour.—BLAVATSKY.

HAUNTING.

Mr. G. Pedell, West End, High Wycombe, Bucks, favours us with a letter enclosing a long cutting from the Evening Advertiser, published at London, Ontario. It reports with minute details the haunting of a house in Bond-street, of that town, while Mr. P. resided there, three years ago. The details were furnished by the family (six persons), who finally left the house by reason of being perpetually disturbed and alarmed by noises as of feet shuffling about; doors overhead slamming, followed by sounds of struggling and heavy falling; then a long continuous and monotonous sound as of the dropping of some heavy liquid on the floor above, on a part where there was a dark stain; at feeling cold winds on their faces while passing along the passage and stairs; sounds of moaning. All these and other phenomena occurred when none but the family, who alone occupied the house, were in it. On their leaving, the premises were put under thorough repair, and Mr. P. believes all such disturbances ceased.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- J. C.—Thanks for extract. It will be used shortly.
 G. Z.—See answer to "M. A. D." We have not yet received the letters to which you refer.
 J. D. HULL.—We sent to Professor Lyman exactly as you directed. We will, however, according to our rule, send again.
 J. MAYNER (Kingston, Jamaica).—We are duly receiving the exchange. "LIGHT" is being regularly despatched to your address.
 WM. KEENLYSIDE.—We are pleased to learn that Mrs. Britten's visit to Blyth has been productive of such good results. We will look out a few books for you shortly.
 CARA.—Your experience is interesting. You will receive a communication on the subject to elicit further details, after which we shall publish it. Your name and address shall be treated as confidential.
 G. D. HAUGHTON.—We are pleased to learn that you have ascertained the reason why your copies of "LIGHT" were not delivered, and that the error did not rest with us. The book has been duly despatched.
 J. C. D.—Letter about "Electric Girl" received, but we do not think it advisable to publish it until further evidence is available. It is not yet quite clear whether the phenomenon is genuine, or the result of mechanical arrangements.
 J. RUMBLE.—We do not think an advertisement would be of any use, and that you would spend your money fruitlessly. [Mr. Rumble desires to obtain a situation for a girl of fifteen, as nursemaid, or in any light capacity. She has been brought up in an industrial school.—ED.]
 M. A. C.—We refused to advertise the so-called "psychic healer," Theon, unless he gave us references to well-known Spiritualists. This he refused to do. With reference to "Dr. S.," yours is not the first complaint we have received. If what you say is true, you should publish the facts.
 MRS. JEROME.—We are much obliged by your drawing our attention to Jules Claretie's novel, entitled "Jean Mornas." We like to know of every book in which allusions to Spiritualism and allied subjects are made, especially in cases like this, where so much interest is excited. Your statement that Schoppenhauer was either consciously or unconsciously a Spiritualist is very interesting and valuable. Will you kindly send us the extracts from his biography which bear on this point? If you could also lend us a copy of "Jean Mornas," we could make good use of it.
 JAMES J. ROGERS (Barrow-in-Furness).—Surely the egotism and ignorance of Mr. A. H. Sykes's letter to the Independent Review speak for themselves. As we have already pointed out in these columns, Mr. Gowland stands self-convicted of having made false statements, and as for Mr. Sykes, he deliberately and knowingly misstates the facts of the case when he asserts that we adopt "coercive measures" to silence anti-Spiritualists. Every reader of "LIGHT" cannot but be aware that we always give a hearing to all opponents who write in a courteous spirit. Mr. Sykes was abusive, and threatened us if we failed to insert his letter. We naturally promptly refused to comply with his request, but at the same time promised that, notwithstanding his offence, we would, as soon as he approached us in a courteous manner, give him the same opportunities for stating his views as we have always given to opponents. Mr. Gowland's performance was a mere burlesque of Mr. Eglinton's séances, the conditions being entirely dissimilar, and moreover, the former made wild assertions at a public meeting which he had afterwards to retract. In these circumstances, you can hardly be surprised that Messrs. Gowland and Sykes are not regarded as worth powder and shot. As regards the table, you must remember that Mr. Gowland himself pronounced it satisfactory, giving a certificate to that effect. This certificate is in our possession. It is true he afterwards said he gave that certificate "to show how easily people could be gulled," but in doing so must have forgotten that he convicted himself of prevarication if of nothing worse. Mr. Eglinton not only does not refuse to submit to any reasonable test condition, but he, on the contrary, rather courts critical investigation. Mr. Eglinton will probably see this answer of ours, and may write himself on the subject.

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobus, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à M.M. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (tout de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

"4th May, 1847."

ROBERT HOUDIN.

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'habileté puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).— I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Maskelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the mediumistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the physical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates mediumistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you," &c., &c.

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. I must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerov, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, Try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

SPIRITUALISM, SPIRITUALISTS, AND THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THOSE WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

By JOHN S. FARMER.

The following letter addressed to me by a prominent working member of the Society for Psychical Research, and my reply, speak sufficiently for themselves to need no further introduction:—

DEAR MR. FARMER.—I learn from Mr. — this evening that, from some remarks of mine which have been reported to you, you have inferred that I intended to impute possible dishonesty to you in the matter of the W— séance. Pray let me assure you that no remarks of mine were intended to bear such a construction. I have no ground for supposing you to be less honest in this investigation than I am conscious of being myself, and I have never said a word that was intended to throw a doubt upon your bona fides. I am sorry that there should have been any misunderstanding.

I did, however, express my regret that you had been present at the W— séance, and had held an important position at the séance—next to the medium, that is; and I think it likely that my remarks on the point were misinterpreted. I said that to the outside public the fact of your presence in an important position in the circle would certainly lessen the evidential value of any phenomena obtained, and for this reason. Outsiders think, as you doubtless know better than I do, that a believer in Spiritualistic phenomena is probably either an accomplice in fraud or an easy dupe—in either event, a bad witness. Under whichever category outsiders might place you, your presence at the séance would certainly be regarded as a weak point in the evidence, and would probably render an account of the séance of little value for evidential purposes. To put it syllogistically, a sceptic would reason in this way:—

From the testimony which Mr. F. has already given, it is evident that, if he is honest and a trustworthy witness, some of the phenomena called Spiritualistic are true.

Now—according to the testimony of universal experience—none of the phenomena called Spiritualistic are true.

Therefore Mr. F. is either dishonest or incompetent.

I hope this explanation will satisfy you that I cast no slur upon your character in regretting, as I did regret, your presence at the séance in question.

DEAR MR. —, —As your letter of the 28th ult. refers to questions of general interest now exercising the minds of many Spiritualists, and as it also touches indirectly on the whole attitude of the Society for Psychical Research to—wards Spiritualism, I will reply through the columns of "LIGHT." I am further induced to do this in the hope that frank speaking, and fuller explanations, may, in some measure, remove the unpleasant impressions now entertained by many Spiritualists, both inside and outside this Society, as to its attitude and capacity.

* It is only fair to state that the writer did not, in the first place, intend this letter for publication. I therefore treat it as a private communication by excluding the signature and other marks of identity. I am sure that every opportunity will be afforded for replying under the same or other conditions.—J.S.F.

It will suffice for me to deal with your letter mainly on general lines. The W— séance is only one incident, and I do not take the arguments to apply to myself personally; they are, I conceive, used in a general sense and apply to Spiritualists at large, and their capacities for, and methods of investigation. Allow me, without in any way anticipating the report of the W— Committee (which, however, I now publicly challenge them to publish with full names and particulars), to briefly relate the salient points of the séances in question.

The Haunted House Committee of the Society for Psychical Research received, from apparently trustworthy and independent witnesses, a record of hauntings in a cottage some distance from London. There appeared to be a good prima facie case for inquiry, whereupon certain members of the Society for Psychical Research formed themselves into a committee of investigation, and arranged to spend from Saturday to Monday at the place. For some reason or other it was suggested by them that probably better results would be obtained if they were able to secure the services of a medium. They were successful in so arranging, and they also courteously asked me to accompany them as a guest, the reason stated being my "long experience in regard to Spiritualistic phenomena." Of the eight men forming the party, six were members or associates of the Society for Psychical Research; the other two—the medium and myself—were not connected with that Society, and were, moreover, well-known and long-avowed Spiritualists. The results exceeded all expectation: the phenomena occurring were rough and violent,—maliciously so to my mind. On each occasion, mainly for reasons obvious to experienced investigators, I occupied a seat next to the medium, two other individual members of the party also alternately filling the corresponding position. The séances were held in total darkness. This was much against my will and advice. At each séance I protested strongly against this condition, the medium naturally expressing no opinion. Hands were held all round, and at the close of each séance each member of the circle testified that the chain had been unbroken as far as he was individually concerned. The phenomena were of such a nature that, accepting these statements, and in view of a thorough search of the house previously, they must have been due to some agency outside the eight persons visibly present.

This is, I think you will admit, a correct though bald account of the circumstances of the case. Now what are your points? You "regret my presence at the séance," and that I "held an important position—next to the medium, that is." Surely your first point is a matter which concerns the members of the Society for Psychical Research, who originated the circle, more than it concerns me. If they wilfully introduced elements, knowing that such introductions would, in their minds, vitiate results, they were deplorably lacking in common sense. I, however, do not believe a single member present at the séance in question adopts the attitude so foolishly and rashly taken by those who were absent. I am, however, open to correction in this. With regard to my sitting next the medium it is true I did so. Why, however, should I be singled out for objection? You admit there are no grounds for supposing me to be less honest in this investigation than you are conscious of being yourself. Yet you not only say nothing calling in question the bona fides of the other two men who also occupied at times a similar position, but actually specially mention me. Is it because I am a Spiritualist and they are not so avowed? There really seems only this inference that can be drawn, more especially in view of the whole tenor of your letter.

If we deal according to the rules laid down by you with regard to alleged "suspicious elements" in the conditions, as narrated, it seems to me I have grave cause for logically doubting the bona fides of all the circle except the medium, inasmuch as the experiment was, as a matter of fact, held in total darkness in spite of my protests.

This brings me to the general attitude of yourself and several prominent members of the Society for Psychical Research, but I wish it to be distinctly understood that nothing I may say is in the least degree meant to be personal. You speak of "the outside public," putting them in the place of critics. In the first instance, I deny the competency of "the outside public" to occupy such a position, and I shall be surprised if you maintain the claim. A chemist might just as well expect a man ignorant of the rudiments of chemistry to understand fractional analysis. Douglas Jerrold once said, "Public opinion is only the average stupidity of mankind." He was not far wrong. Only those who are competent—i.e., those who have proved themselves lovers of, and seekers for truth, who have had the requisite experience, and have exercised common sense in dealing with this experience—are capable of passing judgment, or giving a verdict. Whose view shall we then accept, taking these qualifications as our basis?—"the outside public," or the men of experience, whose verdict, by-the-by, as to the genuineness of these facts after due inquiry, has been and is unanimous?

It seems to me, therefore, that you and the leaders of the Society for Psychical Research generally put yourselves in a false position when you attach so much importance to what an incompetent tribunal will say and think. Does not history give the lie to the utility of such fear for one's skin? Do you really imagine that such a course will recommend itself with respect even to that outside public, which you are so anxious to consider and convert—a world which, though slow to receive and apply any new truth, is remarkably keen, clear-sighted, and appreciative when it is a question of straightforward out-spokenness? The fact of Spiritualists standing firm and immovable in defence of what they know to be a truth, through nearly forty years of ridicule, abuse, and persecution, is bearing fruit at last. Would that the labours of those who have borne the burden and heat of the day—men who have alone rendered possible a society like the Society for Psychical Research—were duly acknowledged by those who should be amongst the first to appreciate the results at which they have arrived.

Instead of this their work is largely discounted and passed by, or surely the attempts to prejudice the subject by the many disparaging allusions to Spiritualism and Spiritualists, and the capacity of the latter, together with the soundness of the methods they adopted, which crop up so frequently in the literature of the Society, could never have found currency. Spiritualists as a class are not thin-skinned, their past experience having rendered them proof against much that would otherwise burn and rankle, but these allusions have, I fear, wrought little service to the Society for Psychical Research, and that in the face of a loyal desire to acknowledge and recognise at its full value the work done and results obtained by the Society in one branch of occult research.

For myself, and I think I also express the views of a large number of Spiritualists, I believe our "cue" is to trouble but little about "the outside public." They are not as yet even ready to accept evidence, much less to judge righteous judgment.

Do you, however, class yourself among "the outside public"? I hope not, as thereby you would be doing yourself an injustice. Nevertheless, the position you take up for the supposititious "outside public," although thinly veiled, is, I take it, meant to represent your own attitude. If I am right I do not wonder at your finding yourself with a barren experience. There is yet the very first lesson in spiritual science to be learnt.

Your syllogistical application of the sceptic's position contains a gross fallacy. It is not the case that "according to universal experience none of the phenomena called Spiritual are true," and your deduction therefore falls to the ground. As a matter of fact the universality of testimony is rather on the other side. If you will point out a nation or an age in which phenomena, similar in kind, if not in degree, to those called Spiritual have not been alleged to occur, I will at once abandon my position. In the meantime I aver that there is a weight of testimony in favour of Spiritual phenomena such as few of even the so-called exact sciences can produce. It is true that there has been "money," in many of the latter and that, therefore, the facts have been more exhaustively studied and applied to the needs and conditions of life than has Spiritual science. That, however, is a reproach which will doubtless mend itself in time. As a matter of fact, many things in scientific research are contrary to the "universal" experience, so-called, of "the outside public," and, moreover, are not supported by collateral evidence occurring all over the civilised globe—do you therefore reject them?

It is with extreme regret that I have to confess—and my opportunities for judging are by no means few—that the feeling amongst Spiritualists at large is that, in spite of the fair promise under which the Society started, there is little now to be expected of them as far as Spiritualism is concerned; that the whole attitude to and treatment of the subject is hardly calculated to inspire confidence. The claims of Spiritualists and Spiritualism are systematically ignored; the genesis of the Society has been misrepresented in the Proceedings, and to crown all a member of the Society for Psychical Research, reputed to be antagonistic to the Spiritual theory, and who it is doubtful has had the requisite experience for such a task, has accepted an invitation from the editor of the "Encyclopedia Britannica" to write an article on Spiritualism for that work, instead of standing aside in favour of those who at least have the requisite knowledge and experience. Verily the outlook is not reassuring. Mr. Myers, in the last Proceedings, complains that an appeal for evidence relating to Spiritual phenomena produced little reply. I regret the fact, but I am hardly surprised. If those who have channels of investigation which they could throw open to the members of the Society for Psychical Research are informed that because their experience has led them to certain conclusions their presence at any séance would be "regretted," and would "probably render an account of the séance of little value for evidential purposes" to those who confessedly lack experience in such matters—if they know this, it is scarcely surprising that such an appeal should be made in vain. Is nothing to be counted in regard to honesty of purpose and sacrifice for truth?

Complaints are made that evidence is scarce, that there is a dearth of witnesses. My answer is, first publish boldly MANUAL OF PSYCHOMETRY: The Dawn of a New Civilisation. By Joseph Rodes Buchanan, M.D. Published by the author. Price 8s. 6d. English Agency, The Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, Strand, W.C.

Psychometry (from psyche, the soul; and metron, a measure) or the power of measuring by the soul, owes its discovery to Professor Buchanan, who, in the winter of 1842-43, observed certain facts which led him to the conclusion that mind and character could be measured; the history of the hidden past revealed; and the interior nature and history of persons and things present or absent, living or dead, truly and critically estimated. By personal investigation and instruction, and also by means of lectures on the subject he gradually extended a knowledge of its principles, and, by degrees, a mass of facts was collected which seemed to allow of no questioning of the general truth of these startling claims. For upwards of forty years Dr. Buchanan has continued his researches, and has now given to the world in this large volume the results of his labour. There is much in Dr. Buchanan's work of interest and, what is far more important, of extreme value to the Spiritualist. Without desiring in any way to underrate the value of the excellent results attained by investigators in the past—their works speak, indeed!—it yet seems to us that we Spiritualists of to-day are too little careful of the heritage we have had handed down to us; and that we are somewhat in the position of the servant who, in the ancient fable, had received a talent which he forthwith hid from sight and rendered useless either to himself or his fellow men. We want above all else careful and original research in regard to the latent powers of spirit, embodied or disembodied; for that we must learn to depend upon ourselves and not on others. In this light, therefore, we regard Dr. Buchanan's Manual as extremely opportune and useful.

Psychometry deals with the latent normal powers of the embodied spirit. It is curious to note in this respect the correlation between the trio, Psychometry, Mesmerism, and Mediumship. They may be thus tabulated:—

Psychometry: dealing with the normal powers of embodied spirit.

Mesmerism: dealing with the abnormal powers of embodied spirit.

Mediumship: dealing with the powers of disembodied spirit.

Each of these three branches of occult science overlaps and merges into the other, and it is difficult to say where one ends and the other begins. One thing, however, seems clear, viz., that we here possibly catch a glimpse of an orderly arrangement and graduation of phenomena which have in some respects seemed without sequence, and beyond any but a general classification. Not less important are the indications we also get as to a more rational method of dealing with those who are honestly and truly seeking practical knowledge concerning the nature and capacity of spirit. We have long felt, by reason of the experience gained while conducting this journal, that some well-conceived system of study, capable of being placed before those who thus seek, was urgently required. Broadly it appears to us that the course should be as here indicated; the details of the instruction we leave for abler organisers to arrange or suggest. Surely, however, the first step for an inquirer is to recognise and study the capacities and powers of the embodied spirit in its normal state—to begin at the lowest rung of the ladder instead of half way up, or near the top, as when Spiritualism is studied without a previous knowledge of either psychometry or mesmerism. In such a case half the difficulties which beset the inquirer would not exist at all, and the many other advantages of such a course of study are sufficiently obvious to need little particularisation.

Those who take a similar view cannot do better than peruse and study Dr. Buchanan's "Manual of Psychometry"—indeed we will go farther and say that even advanced Spiritualists who have no acquaintance with this subject have missed a very important and indispensable branch of spiritual knowledge.

Dr. Buchanan's discovery was made in this wise. Having for many years made a special study of the nervous system of man, he was informed by Bishop Polk, of the American Episcopal Church, that his sensibility was so acute that if he should, by accident, touch a piece of brass, even in the night, when he could not see what he touched, he immediately felt the influence through his system, and could recognise the offensive metallic taste. The discovery of such sensibility in one so vigorous both in mind and body as and without comment what is already collected; adopt the same course with Spiritual phenomena of any kind that you have with "Phantasms of the Living," and I make bold to say that you will require to double the size of both your magazines. In the case in point, you have considered testimony which is certainly not even of yesterday, or all first-hand. If "LIGHT" of the past two years alone is ransacked, a wealth of evidence will be found, which, if duly weighed and considered, will, I venture to say, shatter the extraordinary amplification of Dr. Carpenter's "unconscious cerebration" theory, now put forward by the Society for Psychical Research in explanation of some of the phenomena. It is all the more strange that this evidence should be neglected in face of the fact that a fair proportion of vice-presidents, members of Council, and members or associates of the Society for Psychical Research are among the witnesses referred to. Dearth of evidence indeed! Nor is this all. It is, I believe, true that certain prominent members of the working section of the Society for Psychical Research possess records of séances kept during many years. If these exist, why are they not dealt with? Surely they are of undoubted value. The only conclusion is that if evidence is wanted there is plenty to hand.

I am afraid you will regard my letter as a grumble all round. At any rate, it is better for any society to know what is being said of it. At present it occupies a position somewhat analogous to that of a clergyman who year in and year out lays down the law without fear of opposition or criticism. The bulk of the debateable questions connected with these topics appear in the Journal—published "for private circulation only." It is true permission is given to quote if applied for, but in any case the restriction tends to cramp free inquiry and discussion, both of which are doubly invaluable when dealing with abstruse subjects of inquiry like Spiritualism and kindred subjects.

For the rest, I hope and believe a basis of agreement and work will be found possible between Spiritualists and the Society for Psychical Research. The former, I will answer for it, will readily respond to any disposition on the part of the latter to treat the subject of Spiritualism with that calmness and justice which is due to it. We have both a common interest in attaining such a position.—Yours truly,

JOHN S. FARMER.

A LAD in the State Institution for the Deaf, Dumb, and Blind, at Romney, Hampshire County, Vir., born with cataract in each eye, has gone under operations resulting in his acquiring sight. For fifteen years he had depended upon his other senses for his impressions of the outer world. His acquisition of the new sense was at first useless to him. Objects which had been familiar to him he did not recognise until he touched them. His eyes were like an infant's, gazing at things with a vague, wondering expression. Thus will it be, we imagine, with those who in this life are blind to spiritual things, when they have laid off their garment of earthly material.—The Golden Gate.

REV. P. S. HANSON recently delivered a lecture in Chicago on "Fools." He discoursed of "Fools old, young, big, and little; of religious fools and irreligious; drunken fools and sober fools"; and lastly of "Spiritualist fools." Upon the last point he said: "No spirits ever returned to the earth after their eyes had fallen upon the glories of Heaven. Spiritualism is all wicked bosh, and I warn Christians to flee from it as from a lie of the devil." We wonder if Rev. P. S. Hanson believes the story of the return of Moses and Elias on a certain occasion? Is it not possible that he omitted, in his discourse, the enumeration of still another class of fools?—The Golden Gate.

WHAT has been meant by the tradition of Christ's resurrection was essentially the belief that He had reappeared from the spirit world to certain disciples. The stories that have been handed down concerning those manifestations have heretofore simply perplexed good people, who have ventured to reason upon the matter, by their apparent contradiction to all they had known of the limitations of bodily existence. And now behold these same phenomena are before our eyes as natural forms of action of rare organisations, even in the flesh. Regarding the phenomena of Spiritualism, therefore, simply as strange manifestations of man's nature upon earth, they clear the air for us to see the possibility of what Paul called a spiritual body. Physical science does not even seriously challenge our faith in immortality. It is clearing the ground for a new, natural, and rational faith in immortality.—REV. J. NEWTON.

was Bishop Polk led Dr. Buchanan to suppose that it might be found in others. In this he was justified by observation. It soon appeared that the power was quite common; that there were many who could determine by touching a piece of metal or by holding it in their hands, what the metal was—as they recognised a peculiar influence proceeding from it which in a few moments gave them a distinct taste in the mouth. This power was not confined in its operation to metallic substances. We continue in Dr. Buchanan's own words:—

"Every substance possessing a decided taste appeared to be capable of transmitting its influence into the system, and of being recognised by its taste. Sugar, salt, pepper, acids, and other substances of a decided taste, made so distinct an impression that each could be recognised and named by many of those upon whom the experiment was performed. It did not appear that the sense of taste was translated to the fingers, or changed any of its known laws, but it did appear that contact of the sapid substance with the papilla of the tongue was by no means necessary. The peculiar influence of the substance touched or held in the hand by sensitive persons appeared to affect the hand locally, and thence to be transmitted gradually along the arm, recognised by some peculiar sensation as it passed, and producing no other effects until it reached the chest or the head. In the head it produced its impression upon the brain and nerves, and, if possessed of sapid qualities, was recognised by their characteristic impression upon the tongue and fauces. The sweetness of sugar, the pungency of pepper, and all the peculiarities of other tastes were recognised, as if the same substances, instead of being held in the hands, had been gradually, in small quantities, introduced into the mouth. (It is perhaps necessary for me to state that these experiments were entirely independent of any mesmeric process, and consisted simply of what I have stated. The public mind has been so accustomed to the processes of mesmeric operators, that unless a special disclaimer is made, it may be supposed that such experiments were made upon mesmeric or somnambulant patients, prepared by a magnetising process.) The number of individuals who could exercise the acute sensibility and taste which I have described appeared to be variable in different localities, being greater in warm climates than in cold. In some places one-fourth, or even one-half, of the whole population appeared to be capable of displaying this new power of the nervous system. In other places not more than one in ten or fifteen could display it distinctly. Mental cultivation and refinement, acute sensibility, delicacy of constitution, a nervo-sanguineous temperament, and a general predominance of the moral and intellectual organs, constituted the most favourable conditions for its exercise."

In a class of 130 students experiments were made in this direction with medicines of various kinds, the trial being conducted in such a way that any play of the imagination could be at once detected, and in some instances the medicine was unknown to all present until the close of the experiment. Forty-three members of the class, or about one-third, were successful in these results.

The conclusion arrived at through these and other experiments was that the nervous system is capable of being affected by a subtle influence emanating from all objects, and it was soon verified by experience that those who possessed this sensibility were distinctly affected by contact with living beings, and were able to correctly appreciate the influence proceeding from them, even without actual contact. The next steps are thus described:—

"It seemed probable that if the psychological influence of the brain could be transmitted through a suitable conducting medium, it might also be imparted to objects in proximity to it, and retained by them, so as to be subsequently recognised by one of impenetrable constitution. Without relating the experiments which established this proposition, I would proceed at once to the most wonderful experiment of all. To proceed with my narrative: It was in the latter part of '42 that I made the experiment which I would narrate now—not merely to appeal to the reader's faith, but to give him an example for his own experimental inquiries. I had clearly ascertained in a young gentleman with whom I had made many experiments the existence of extraordinary acuteness of sensibility. In a moment's contact with the head of any individual he would discover his entire character by the sympathetic impression. Reasoning, which I need not now repeat, had convinced me that he possessed the power of recognising a mental influence in any autograph that he might touch. I was sitting with my young friend in an apartment in Astor House, when I resolved to test his powers. I proceeded to my trunk, and took four letters written by individuals of strongly marked and peculiar characters. I placed them successively in his hands, and requested him to watch the mental impressions to which they gave rise in his mind, and report his conceptions of the characters of the writers. He did so, and his descriptions surpassed my anticipations. He entered into the spirit of each character as familiarly as if he had been in contact with the individual, and described not only his intellect and his principles of action, but even his personal appearance and physical constitution. He knew not of whom he was speaking—he did not even know what letters I had placed in his hands—yet I can say, without exaggeration, that his description would not have been more correct if he had described the individuals from familiar personal knowledge."

It is foreign to our present purpose to deal further with the practice and application of psychometry, of which Dr. Buchanan gives many examples. It would be impossible within these limits to do anything like justice to the importance of the subject. Sufficient, however, has been said to indicate the scope and practical aim of the book. We also purpose publishing at an early date a few practical articles on the subject.

FIVE YEARS OF THEOSOPHY: Mystical, Philosophical, Theosophical, Historical, and Scientific Essays selected from "The Theosophist." London: Reeves and Turner, 7s. 6d. May be obtained by post from the Psychological Press, 16, Craven-street, London, W.C.

As implied by its title this book consists of reprinted articles selected from the Theosophist. They embrace a wide field of study; how far they are of value we are not at present in a position to say. Though these special articles are not, we understand, put forward as authoritative, yet we cannot but remember the attitude adopted by prominent members of the Theosophical Society, in the controversy arising out of circumstances to which we need not now more particularly allude.

The protest of Spiritualists in connection with this controversy with Theosophy was not directed against any new light which it could possibly throw upon a perplexing subject, but rather against the arrogant "Thus saith the Lord" method of its presentation; against the insufficient evidence upon which Spiritualists were expected to swallow the alleged facts of Theosophy; and more especially against the wilful and systematic misrepresentation of Spiritualism indulged in by prominent Theosophists. They habitually, and we confess, it appears to us wilfully, attributed to the Spiritualism of to-day the characteristics of twenty years since, whereas vast strides had been made since then. As a matter of fact, Theosophy at its inception, and at the time of which we speak, calmly and coolly passed off as its own exclusive teaching much that was due to the labour and research of Spiritualists, and it had not even the grace to acknowledge the source of its inspiration. And as regard the methods and "facts" of Theosophy has not the logic of events proved the value of the general conclusions arrived at by Spiritualists?

We feel we are only re-echoing the views of the majority of Spiritualists in this country when we welcome criticism on all sides. Feeling that the more we learn of Spiritualism the less we really know, we are ready to be taught by any man having knowledge and ability. We feel that, standing midway between the Theosophical Society, as now constituted, on the one hand, and the Society for Psychical Research on the other, we may learn much from both. All we ask is that there may be no misunderstanding of the position we hold, or of the methods we adopt. Let it not be forgotten that while insisting upon the spiritual theory as a legitimate outcome of facts, we do not presume to deny the action of spirit other than that of the mighty dead; that we recognise that man is a spirit here and now, and as such has latent spiritual qualities; that beyond the order of embodied and disembodied spirit there may be a vast realm filled with the unembodied orders of spiritual being: this, we conceive, is the present position of most Spiritualists.

It is with regret that we notice the same dogmatic and unreasonable estimate of Spiritualism perpetuated in the volume before us. We had hoped that it would have been otherwise. For the rest we may say that those who care for speculation devoid of an apparent sound foundation on facts, will find in "Five Years of Theosophy" a volume to their tastes.

THE JOURNAL OF SCIENCE (1s. 6d. monthly, 18s. per annum).

All Spiritualists should read this magazine. It is one of the very few which deals fairly and honourably with Spiritualism. Hardly a month passes but that it contains articles or notes relating to the subjects with which we are specially concerned. In last week's "LIGHT" we gave in extenso an article taken from this magazine which could not fail to commend itself to our readers,

CORRESPONDENCE.

[It is preferable that correspondents should append their names and addresses to communications. In any case, however, these must be supplied to the Editor as a guarantee of good faith.]

The Electric Girl.

To the Editor of "LIGHT."

SIR,—It appears from a letter from one of your correspondents some weeks back, and an answer to "J. C. D." in your current issue, that the "Electric Girl," or "Goddess Electra," is affording some mystification; and, "as it is not yet quite clear whether the phenomenon is genuine, or the result of mechanical contrivance," perhaps you will kindly allow me to offer your correspondents the assurance that it is the result of a very simple contrivance which anyone can effectively employ. As I should be most unwilling to injure the exhibitor of this, whose only means of living it may be, I cannot make public the explanation, but will most willingly do so by private communication to any of your correspondents who would not prefer to cherish the illusion.—And remain, sir, yours very truly, September 12th, 1885.

AN appreciative "local sketch," entitled "With the Spiritualists," appears in a recent issue of the Coventry Herald.

A LIVELY discussion on Spiritualism has been in progress in the South Australian Times, published at Adelaide. As an instance of the interest excited, it may be mentioned that special supplements of correspondence have been issued.

DRAWING MEDIUMSHIP.—D. L. Shaw, of Chicopee, Mass., writes: "I am an investigator. A dear daughter, eighteen years old, departed this life nine months ago. She had learned to paint flowers, &c. She seems to have returned to her mother, who is now executing some fine drawings. They come through her hand when she takes a pencil in hand and holds it on drawing paper laid on the table. My wife was never a Spiritualist. She also has communications by writing: some very beautiful."—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

ANOTHER SLATE WRITING MEDIUM.—Dr. H. R. Rogers has recently come to New York from Philadelphia, and is giving sittings. The writer of this had one a few days ago, and received a message covering the whole surface of a slate, under the following conditions: Two slates cleaned by himself and fastened by a rubber band, with a small piece of pencil between them, were held by himself upon the top of his head, the medium standing at his side with his hands upon the surface of the upper slate. The sound of writing was heard within the slates for about three minutes; then three light taps. The sifter then removed the band, and found the written communication spoken of.—H.K. in the "Spiritual Offering."

DIRECT SPIRIT PAINTING.—Mrs. Diss Debar is a medium through whom direct paintings come. She hands to one of the circle a small, plain square of cardboard, and, after he has marked it, tells him to hold it on the top of his head in such a way that the edge of the card may rest on it with the marked face of the card forward. The medium does not touch it from the moment of putting it plain into his hands. At the end of perhaps a minute, after a few squirms, holding the hands of one or more of the circle, the medium says, "Look now," and there on the unmarked side of the card is a fresh little painting which would take an artist hours to execute. This manifestation reminds me of séances I had years ago in company with Epes Sargent, when coloured crayon drawings were produced in a somewhat similar way. We did not think the drawings were done by any kind of mechanical operation, but psychical, as I do the present paintings. We may know hereafter more about such things than we do at present.—The "Spiritual Offering's" Boston Correspondent.

A HAUNTED CAR.—Two tram-cars run on Chestnut and Walnut-streets after midnight. The driver of one, Bill, an old and trustworthy one, says that some nights ago his car was boarded by a man resembling closely one whom he knew as a constant passenger, and who died five years ago. On his approaching the man he nodded and smiled just as he used to do, and then faded away. He told another passenger what he had seen. This passenger, making the journey a few nights after, saw, with Bill, the same object. He says: "Being kept in town very late, I had to ride home in Bill's car. As it ascended the bridge hill, Bill called my attention to someone standing on the platform of the car. He was of ordinary appearance, with a full blonde beard. Bill went up to him, and as he did so I saw the man smile and nod as to an old acquaintance, and then melted away. As the car descended the hill, Bill and I saw the same man seated in the corner of the car. Bill approached him, and the seat was empty! 'That man,' said Bill, 'rode in the car for years. We were always friends. I always used him right, and I can't understand why he should have it in for me.'"—Philadelphia Press.

and this by no means exhausted the extracts we felt tempted to make. Editorially, the subject is treated on its merits. For example, in the August number occurs this passage in a review of Laing's "Modern Science and Modern Thought," a book the object of which, in its own words, is "to give a clear and concise view of the principal results of modern science and of the revolution which they have effected in modern thought." The author deals incidentally with Spiritualism, and his estimate of it "as another widespread modern delusion," the Journal of Science regards as "scarcely in harmony with the facts of the case." We now quote the Journal:—

"He [Mr. Laing] writes: 'In vain medium after medium is detected, and the machinery by which ghosts are manufactured exposed in police-courts; in vain the manifestations of the so-called spirits are repeated by professional conjurers like Maskelyne and Cooke, who disclaim any assistance from the unseen world.' Now, here is precisely the difficulty. Maskelyne and Cooke have never, as far as we are aware, succeeded in producing under fair test conditions even the simpler forms of 'psychography.' They have never—though the attention of one of them was especially called to the case—fixed on the wrist of a man an iron ring, like that of Mr. Husk, too narrow to be passed over the hand. The author's remarks on dreams, somnambulism, and mesmerism, however, are worth attention."

In the same number appeared the first portion of the article we reprinted last week. Curiously enough it was followed by one entitled "Ignoramus et Ignorabimus," intended, we should think, as a kind of apology for the pronounced views expressed in "The Relations between Spiritualism and Science." Here are some of the most pertinent paragraphs:—

"We see that, if any of our present senses were wanting, entire categories of phenomena would escape us, and that entire branches of science as we have them could never have arisen."

"Such being manifestly the case, is it not justifiable to assume that, had we more senses, more gateways of knowledge, we should become cognisant of classes of phenomena which have now for us no existence, and that new unimagined sciences would be developed? A little reflection will convince most of us that the additional knowledge thus gained would in many cases inevitably modify our present views."

"Unless we are prepared to deny the possible existence of such senses, we must admit that our present insight into nature is most fragmentary. We are like men gazing upon a nocturnal landscape upon which fall five narrow beams of light from the windows of a castle, leaving broad regions between them unilluminated. What these dark spaces may contain it is impossible for them to say; but they will be presumptuous in the extreme if they venture to assert that they have a complete view of the entire region, that they see all which does exist, and that whatever they fail to see is 'impossible.' Yet this is exactly the position which men of great reputation have not unfrequently taken. Hence true men of science, fully alive to the responsibilities of their position, are now very reluctant to pronounce on 'impossibilities.'"

"These considerations show us how very imperfect and fragmentary is the primary material upon which science has to work. Entire categories of phenomena escape us. What would be the position of our bookworms if, in the ancient treatises in which they delight, letters, words, sentences, and chapters, in great numbers, were here and there missing? What if they were not aware of the very existence of such gaps and deficiencies, but believed that they had before them the complete text, and proceeded to expound it accordingly? Misinterpretation, surely, of the wildest character would result. Yet the position of us interpreters of nature is but too closely analogous. With our few—and, as we have just called to mind, imperfect—senses, much fails to reach our understanding. Much? Possibly in some directions the most important part. Surely, therefore, we should take good heed not to talk of impossibilities. Remembering that we see only in part, we should not be hasty in rejecting any new light which is offered for our acceptance."

The drift of this is obvious, and we hail with joy the undogmatic attitude here adopted. A fair field and no favour is all that Spiritualists ask; here we shall probably get it.

FAITH-HEALING.—A new sect has arisen in England, claiming to heal by the exercise of faith—by auto-magnetisation. It is severely censured by journals of the pietist school, in the name of what they regard as the true Christian faith. "LIGHT" calls the attention of these latter to the correlation between such facts as those reported of the faith-healers and those recorded of Jesus Christ, and of many prophets and saints. But partisan spirit blinds men to not perceiving that they furnish arms against themselves.—Le Spiritisme.

MATTER AND FORCE.

Monists and Dualists are now in deadly conflict, the former affirming that all the phenomena in the universe consist of various aspects and attributes of matter and force, and the latter that behind nature there is "an infinite power that makes for righteousness."

The Monists are to a man against Spiritualism in any form, even in the form of a future existence for mankind, and specially in the form of a supreme, infinite, and absolutely independent Ruler of the physical universe, and its innumerable and infinitely varied inhabitants.

In the opinion of Monists, who for the most part are speculative physical scientists, there is no God, and no necessity for one; no spiritual man, and no future state of conscious existence for man in any form.

The Dualists, on the other hand, and specially those who have adopted what are termed modern spiritual theories, recognise a Supreme Ruler to whom all nature is subservient, and they further recognise the existence of innumerable commonwealths of spiritual beings, who have been born upon, and passed their preliminary stages on the myriad worlds of this infinite Cosmos.

Monists accept the theory that matter and force have all the powers and potencies with which we are familiar, and, besides that all the powers and potencies of the universe, of the overwhelming majority of which, the wisest men on earth know absolutely nothing.

Monists further affirm that matter is infinite, eternal, and indestructible, that it always has been and always will be; that its quantity will never vary an atom in weight or physical potency, although they can scarcely affirm that it will not vary in intellectual potency, and what may be termed its vital power has vastly increased since the earth was a molten mass, although Monists may assert, that the force which was exhibited in heat in the molten earth, is only now being exhibited in another aspect as vital and intellectual force, and that all vitality and all mentality are merely peculiar chemical or other physical actions. To believe this, they must believe that all vital action and mental manifestation lay potentially in the earth's primordial fire-mists, and further, that it must have been there eternally.

Dualists or Spiritualists, on the other hand, as a body, refrain from the expression of opinions as to the eternity and essential potencies of matter, and recognise the existence of a Supreme Spiritual Power, and spiritual intelligences, who do not come within the range of those conditions to which all matter appears to be subject.

Monists believe in a material universe, and that only. Dualists defend the theory of a dual universe, the two parts of which are intimately related to each other, but the laws governing one, although related to, are not analogous to those governing the other.

From the times of Lucretius, Lucippus, Democritus, Epicurus, Anaxagoras, Aristotle, Socrates, Plato, Descartes, Leibnitz, Newton, Holbach, Diderot, and more modern writers and thinkers, the contest between Monists and Dualists has proceeded, and now proceeds with increasing vigour, since both sides admit that motion is a property of matter, and that not only is every huge sphere in the universe in complex motion, but that every atom and molecule in existence is in a condition of ceaseless activity, and that a motionless atom is an impossibility.

Rest, says Meyer, does not exist. "It is an exquisite dream, a phantom of hope which the world knows not, which is without an instance in Nature. Nature itself knows no death, but only change; no destruction, but only the passing over into other forms of motion; it is an eternally raging, whirling sea of motion and of change."

Modern Spiritual phenomena have not reached us a day too soon. The intellectual world is drifting into a cheerless and pessimistic Monism, which allows us life without a sentient future, a high intellectual and moral Now, to end in blank negation. The theologians of the world are powerless to meet the needs of the profoundest theorists. The analogies of nature itself are far from clear, and the despised phenomena of Modern Spiritualism, which science at present taboos as unworthy of examination, are breaking, and will continue to break, the links that are fast binding the learned world in what appear to be adamant chains of materialistic falsities.

MRS. CORNER, the medium, is now on her way to St. Petersburg in her husband's ship.

MR. J. G. MEUGENS has returned to this country after a successful trip to the United States.

CLAPHAM JUNCTION.—If any readers of "LIGHT" know of any Sunday services for Spiritualists in this neighbourhood will they kindly send particulars to our office?

MRS. M. S. WILLIAMS, the American medium, accompanied by Mrs. Anderson, left London on Thursday last for the United States. The reception accorded her on the 7th inst. was well attended.

WE regret to learn that Miss Kate Cook, so favourably known to many of our readers as a remarkable physical medium, has been seriously ill, but we are happy to announce her complete recovery.

A MAGNETIC HEALER.—D. M. Bowman, of Cleveland, Ohio, commercial traveller, has discovered that he has the gift of healing. Some residents of this city have experienced remarkable results of it. He has never made a charge for exercising it: he has simply used it as an investigator.—Religio-Philosophical Journal.

THOUGHT-READING.—Apropos of this the Boston Transcript, gives the following as from Goethe:—"One soul may have an influence upon another, merely from its silent presence; of this I could relate many instances. It has often happened to me that when I have been walking with a friend, and have had a lively image in my mind of something, he has begun to speak of that very thing. I have also known a man who, without saying a word, could silence a party engaged in cheerful conversation, merely by the power of his mind; nay, he could introduce a tone which would make every one uncomfortable. We all have something of an electric and magnetic force within us."

THE guides of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond announce her return to America the last week in October. The meetings in Kensington on Sunday evenings will be the last public meetings in London for the present. A series of private meetings will be held (time and place to be stated to individuals) every Thursday evening during Mrs. Richmond's stay in London, for inner teachings. Those desiring to attend will please send their names (for acceptance by the guides), care of Mrs. Strawbridge. A limited number only can attend. Mrs. Richmond will also answer a few calls to speak in suburban towns, on week-day evenings, but they must be accessible and within easy reach by rail.

SPIRITISM.

By EDUARD VON HARTMANN.

III.

THE IDEALITY OF THE MANIFESTATIONS (Der Vorstellungsinhalt der Kundgebungen).

Having in the previous section discussed the phenomena, which more or less serve as the expression of an ideal content, or under favourable circumstances are applicable to the communication of it, we have now to examine the ideal content itself, which is communicated to us in these unusual ways. Already in dealing with the involuntary movements of speaking, writing, &c., we saw that the guiding intelligence is to be sought in the somnambulant consciousness of the medium; but as the handwriting remains the same, whether the pencil is guided by involuntary muscular movements of the hand itself, or by the mediumistic nerve force through a system of dynamical push and pull lines, so the content of the writing remains in both cases the same. We have, therefore, no reason whatever to doubt that the same parts of the brain which give the innervation-impulse for the radiation and distribution of the nerve force, as for the involuntary muscular movements, serve also for the support of the somnambulant consciousness.

The ideality of the manifestations of a "speaking-medium" coincides with the temporary ideality of his somnambulant consciousness; for a speaking medium is only an auto-somnambulant with the peculiarity of spontaneously imparting his occasional ideas connectedly. The ideality of a writing-medium is, however, not essentially different from that of a speaking-medium, and that of the former is independent of the mode of writing, whether by rapping out the alphabet, or by pointing out letters, or by involuntary handwriting, or by writing at a distance. Whether the medium speaks with changed voice, writes with changed handwriting, or speaks or writes in the character of a named or unnamed third person, makes no difference in this conception; for we know that in the somnambulant consciousness a conversion of the Ego into another person is a phenomenon of quite common occurrence.

Since the medium is either without waking consciousness, or if in masked somnambulism his persisting waking consciousness has ordinarily no knowledge of what passes in the somnambulant consciousness, the medium also must be unaware that it is himself—his somnambulant consciousness—who has in himself, and ejects from himself, this ideal content, i.e., he writes in his waking capacity unconsciously. The experimental proof that this writing is only relatively unconscious, but for the masked somnambulant consciousness is conscious, may, however, be afforded by the medium placing himself in open somnambulism, and then remembering the former unconscious writing and giving an account of it by word of mouth. This happened with Slade, for example, according to Zöllner's report, in respect of a writing at a distance effected in a closed slate the previous day, which had not yet been opened, so that none of the party knew the contents.*

The writing or other mechanical means can give information of everything comprehended in the medium's somnambulant consciousness, but of nothing which this does not fathom. The ideality of the manifestations is just so instructed or ignorant, cultured or uncultured, serious or sportive, thoughtful or foolish, witty or dull, intellectual or silly, as is the content of the medium's somnambulant consciousness. There is no longer much dispute about that; but there are still individuals who are unable to keep distinguished the somnambulant and waking contents of the medium's consciousness, and refer the deviations of the former from the latter to a source apart from the entire person of the medium. It is thus really the ignorance or insufficient knowledge of somnambulism which causes Spiritists to misapprehend the obvious exclusive origin of the communications.

The masked somnambulant consciousness compasses the simultaneously existing waking consciousness, without being itself compassed by the latter, as the waking consciousness of the past is fathomed by the consciousness of open somnambulism, but not the converse. In other words: the conduction of ideas and wishes from the parts of the brain supporting the waking consciousness into those supporting the somnambulant consciousness is easy, but the reverse is difficult. Therefore it is, that the somnambulant consciousness writes words and sentences, answers questions, and takes account of wishes, dictated and proposed by the waking consciousness, either before the commencement of the masked somnambulism or during its continuance. On the other hand, however, the somnambulant consciousness is also able to answer such questions and to heed such wishes as have become known to it (e.g., by thought-reading), though not to the waking consciousness.

The content of the somnambulant consciousness is distinguished from that of waking consciousness partly by its form, partly by its derivation. The form is generally more perceptual (anschaulichen) of greater sensuous palpability, inclines to symbolising and personifications, but is thus easily confused, obscure, and enigmatical in comparison with the abstract reflections of waking consciousness. The derivation is partly the simultaneous waking consciousness, partly the hyperæsthetic memory of the parts of the brain supporting somnambulism, partly direct Thought-transference,* and finally, in part, true clairvoyance. Whoever rightly knows the range of these different sources will scarcely be tempted to look beyond them for explanation of the ideal content of the mediumistic manifestations. But unfortunately the facts of the hyperæsthesia of memory, transference of conscious and unconscious impressions, and clairvoyance are, to the great majority of Spiritists, as unknown as to their opponents. So far, however, as they are known, they are deliberately thrust aside and underestimated, because they threaten destruction to the wishes of the heart.

Hyperæsthetic memory of the somnambulant consciousness yields often the most astonishing material, the derivation of which seems wholly inexplicable, because the simultaneous waking consciousness of the medium has not only no memory of this material, but often fallaciously believes itself able to conclude from accessory circumstances that such impressions could never have been experienced by it. As the somnambulant speaking is able to repeat the sound of words or sentences in foreign, not understood, languages, which have been heard long ago without attention, so can the somnambulant writing repeat the written or printed characters of words and sentences in languages not understood, which have been once regardlessly seen, or even spell such out from unintelligent memory of word-sounds in languages not quite unknown. If, besides, in such proceeding the symbolising and personifying tendency of the somnambulant consciousness induces it to put these communications in the mouth of an absent person, its dramatic metamorphosing talent must at the same time, succeed in dressing out the communication with all sorts of small external traits appropriate to the person represented. In this way communications can be brought about, which in form and content appear to belong as little as possible to the waking consciousness of * Vorstellungstransferung I translate "Thought-transference," because that term is already familiar to the English reader, who is in no danger of here restricting "thought" to intellectual process, or a purely abstract content. "Vorstellung" is sometimes rendered "idea" (as by Messrs. Haldane and Kemp in the title of (and throughout) Schopenhauer's work); "idea" having, then, the extended significance which Berkeley gave to it. In its most general sense, "Vorstellung" is perhaps most properly translated "representation," as always by Mr. Meiklejohn in his translations of Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason." Dr. Hutchison Stirling, in his "Secret of Hegel," remarks on the frequent difficulty of finding a good English equivalent.—T.

* "Transcendental Physics," c. 10.

the medium, and as much as possible to the presupposed author of the dictation. Anyone not familiar with the peculiarities of the somnambule consciousness will in such case almost unavoidably fall into the delusion that the communications are under the spiritual influence of the absent or deceased person who is indicated in them as their author.*

Thought-transference yields results which, for those who are unacquainted with this class of facts, are still more surprising than the effects of hyperesthesia of memory.† We are here putting quite aside interpretation by attitude, gesture, involuntary muscular movements, &c., although even this interpretation may be involuntary, instinctive, of reflex manifestation (reflektorisch zur Kundgebung gelangende), and from the latter afterwards first recognised by the waking consciousness. We restrict ourselves rather to the cases in which such sort of mediation is undoubtedly excluded by the experimental arrangements. We have, then, to distinguish (1) willed perception with willed implantation; (2) willed perception without will in the other to implant; (3) not willed perception with will to implant; (4) not willed perception without will in the other to implant. The will to implant on the side of the person transmitting,‡ and the will to apprehend on that of the recipient, are powerful furtherances to thought-transference; and, indeed, the will to implant seems to have an incomparably greater power of realisation than the will to perceive: a power so great, that with persons in sympathetic rapport through love, friendship, or magnetic relations, it overcomes all earthly distance. The will to perception of others' thoughts can also act favourably, but not in the same degree as the will to implant, because perception by the waking consciousness is generally impossible, and the somnambule consciousness is not immediately subject to the conscious will; more operative than the latter is the ardent desire of the heart, the inward and urgent longing, because it imparts itself to and intensifies the somnambule will.

The will to implant operates likewise, at least in proximity, only through an excitation of the somnambule parts of the brain; but this active, and in few seconds concentrated, excitation is more easily directed, than is the passive to perception, since to a brief perceptive excitation there may be no corresponding energetic thought whatever in the other. The will to implant may also be an unconscious one, seated in the somnambule layers of the brain, in so far as the urgent heart-longing produces the wish to be perceptible to a beloved person; so sleepers may have this unconscious will and transmit their dream-images to a distant person awake or likewise dreaming. With extinction of the motive feelings (home-sickness, longing of love), usually disappears also the unconscious will to thought implantation. All reports of voluntary implantation of intuitive representations in a distant person point to this, that the success of such experiments depends as much on the ability of the willer to place himself transitorily in open or masked somnambulism, as on the sensitivity of the recipient and the strength of the sympathetic rapport between the two. The result seems easier, when the recipient is in a dreaming or half-awake condition, in one, that is, in which the waking consciousness is more or less suppressed.

Success seems most sure when two persons agree upon a definite minute in which to direct their thoughts upon each other, both placing themselves in open or masked somnambulism, the stronger willing of the two undertaking the active, the more sensitive the passive part. If two persons have first practised this distant intercourse, the connection between them is to be re-established at any time by the will of one being directed on the other, exciting in the latter at first an indefinite feeling, or appearance of a distant light, or some other indication serving as a signal, and occasioning him to place himself in somnambulism for the perception of definite communications (Vorstellungen). In this way the initiates of higher degrees in the secret brotherhoods of Tibet have acquired the power of conversing with one another at a distance without telegraph wires, and similar attempts have often succeeded in Europe.* They are most hopeful between magnetiser and somnambule, if the magnetiser is able to put himself into open or masked somnambulism.

Persons between whom there is no sympathetic rapport will have no prospect of success in thought-transference at great distances; in this case the transference, if it is to succeed at all, must be facilitated by spatial proximity or material connection. The nearer the two are to each other in the same room, the better success is there, while in the transference over extended tracts the degree of remoteness does not signify. The presence of other persons is disturbing, because then the cross-influence of all their thoughts trouble and confuse the particular thought to be perceived; and it is especially necessary that spectators should stand considerably away from the transferor. Also confronting with eyes bound seems better for success than when one stands behind the other. If several agree to think the same thought, the transference is facilitated, as the number is greater, evidently by a multiplication or exaltation of the influence similar to that attained when the will to implant and the intensity of the thought are strengthened in a single individual.

Contact, as by application of forehead to forehead, laying the hand on the forehead, crown, or back of the head, or clasping hands, facilitates greatly; but as here the influence of unconscious understanding of involuntary muscular movements comes already into play, results thus obtained no longer prove immediate thought-transference. It is better to form a chain of hands between the two persons, yet then the intermediates introduce disturbance, positive results being only still obtained when the recipient is somnambule, and in magnetic relation to the transferor, but in no rapport with the intervening persons. (Ps. St. IV., 298.) I cannot understand why inorganic conductors of different substances (metal wires, damp cords, &c.) have not yet been used in these experiments, as every communication by involuntary muscular movements is securely avoided by such interposition. Between magnetiser and somnambule no contact or conduction is required to transfer the sense impressions and thoughts of the former to the latter. (Ps. St. III., 529-531.) Also light seems to have a disturbing influence in these experiments, which may bear out the corresponding assertion of mediums; moreover all fatigue is to be carefully avoided, and series of from 30 to 100 experiments in immediate succession, such as Richet's, are a mistake.†

As regards the nature of the representations, the most easily transferable appear to be feelings, dispositions, and distinct sensations of the lower sense organs. Transference of musical impressions and their combinations seems not yet to have been tried, although the telephone, as an aid to sensible presentation, would facilitate such experiments; the diviner must, of course, be musical enough to designate or imitate the tune heard. The transference of visual representations is easier as the representation approximates by hallucinatory distinctness and vivacity to perception;

‡ The "agent" in the convenient terminology of Mesara, Gurney and Myers in the publications of the Society for Psychical Research. This term (and the correlative "percipient") not being restricted to the case of voluntary processes, might be used here throughout, could I venture to take such a liberty with the text.—Tr.

perhaps the facilitation of transference at a distance when the transferor is in a somnambule state has for its sole reason the fact that only in this state are hallucinatory distinctness and vivacity possible. The transference of whatever is not sensible perception or its lively reproduction will be much more difficult, but still in that case easiest when it is clothed with the perceptive form of inwardly spoken and heard words.

All transferences at a distance are hallucinatory sight-pictures, usually of the figure itself of the person who would be manifest to beloved ones at a distance. I know no case in which words put in the mouth of such a figure by the phantasy of the recipient have been verified by the transferor. All manifestations at a distance are completed by mimical movements of the implanted hallucinations, or by symbolical additions to them, but abstract thoughts are never transferred at such a distance.

In immediate proximity, under favourable conditions, not only words, sentences and numbers, but also abstract thoughts, and even thoughts not clothed in words, are transferable. Somnambules accomplish with tolerable certainty the thought-commands of the magnetiser (Ps. St. VI. 103-106), especially if used to this sort of transference; they can repeat, by writing and verbally, words and sentences in languages which they do not understand, which the magnetiser or another placed in rapport with him, dictates for transference, and even understand the sense of them, so far as the transferor understands and conceives while speaking the words aloud or inwardly. The proof is in the fact that somnambules answer intelligently, in languages with which they are familiar, questions put in languages of which they are ignorant, but the answer fails as soon as the question is put in a language which the questioner himself does not understand.* Here it is clear that a thought is transferred which is intelligible by itself, apart from the words, unintelligible to the somnambule, to which it is attached; this is the most spiritualised case of thought-transference conceivable.

When there is neither the conscious nor unconscious will to transfer a mental representation, but there is on the other side the conscious or unconscious will to perceive, then the usually too-widely employed term "thought-reading" is strictly applicable; in which is included "character-reading." A somnambule who is placed in rapport with a person previously quite unknown to him, either by direct contact, or by the mediation of the magnetiser, or by contact with an object containing the personal aura of the individual in question, receives a certain collective impression of the latter, a compound of impressions sympathetic and anti-pathetic. If now the somnambule's will is directed to the interpretation, dissection, and restoration of this impression, there will emerge, according to the sensitivity, and faculty of conveying its impressions in words, a more or less incomplete, indefinite, and inexact, yet not wholly unlike picture of the personality, its character, its immediate feelings and dispositions, and under circumstances even its immediate thought. Thought-reading can finally be an involuntary reception of impressions, if the sensitivity of the somnambule is highly exalted, and the other conditions are favourable.

The percipient of the transferred representations is always the somnambule consciousness, never immediately the waking consciousness. If the somnambule consciousness is alone present and commands the machinery of speech, it is not difficult to establish by interrogation the fact that thought-transference has taken place. It is otherwise if the percipient's somnambule consciousness is masked by the waking consciousness, and the latter has sole rule over the organs of speech and the voluntary muscles. In such cases it cannot be said whether behind the waking consciousness there is a somnambule consciousness or not, and whether, if there is, it perceives another's thoughts or not. Only when the division between somnambule and waking consciousness is not complete, but a faint shimmer of the somnambule consciousness gleams unnoticed into the waking consciousness, imparting a weak colouring to the contents of the latter: only then is it possible to infer mediately, from the waking consciousness, that a thought-transference has taken place in the somnambule consciousness.

The waking consciousness of a normal person must thus be consulted as to the representations in the other person's mind, and if in a long series of experiments its testimony is better than was to be expected from the calculation of probabilities, the overplus is to be set to the credit of the thought-reading somnambule consciousness which even in the normal person lies concealed. These experiments are instituted by Richet,* and in the guessing of colours of playing cards have yielded about ten per cent. better results than the probability, experimental results when the cards were drawn without being looked at agreeing with the latter. Had results when the brain was tired not been taken into account, the percentage in favour of an influence upon the waking by the somnambule consciousness would have been considerably larger. It is most desirable that the experiments should be repeated with avoidance of all fatigue and with greater exclusion of light, new experiments being added by introducing a conductor between the two bodies, gradually increasing the number of transferors, and varying the distance between them and the diviner.

With sensitives to experiment upon, there is a very different prospect of results. Whereas in normal persons the somnambule consciousness not only remains below the threshold, but also has small noticeable influence on the content of the waking consciousness, with sensitives this influence is remarkably apparent, and can be considerably exalted by avoidance of every disturbing and distracting external impression on the waking consciousness, and by attention being concentrated on stimulations transmitted from the somnambule sphere. Barrett's experiments on healthy but sensitive children show that the successful cases of transference of perceptive thoughts (e.g., objects to be fetched) from a person thinking them to the sensitive may exceed the probable figure by more than 100 per cent., and that in the transference by several persons fixing on the same thought the chances of success may rise almost to certainty, so that the sensitive already guessed while outside the room the thought of the sitters within.†

Still more favourable are the conditions, if the difficulties of transition of the thought from the somnambule into the waking consciousness are avoided, i.e., if the experimental conditions are so arranged that the persisting waking consciousness knows nothing at all of the guessing and announcing. This is possible, if the reflex-prohibitions of the parts of the brain supporting the waking consciousness are so far debilitated as to admit the despatch of involuntary innervation impulses by the parts of the brain supporting the somnambule consciousness. This happens in the state of masked somnambulism when the somnambule consciousness, veiled by the waking consciousness, announces its contents either by involuntary muscular movements,‡ or by mediumistic nerve force. Already the divining rod is even for apparently normal and insensitive persons an excellent aid for revealing the thoughts of others by involuntary designation, so far as these thoughts are fixed on an object in the room, and yields successful results

‡ "We have in our collection," says Mr. Edmund Gurney, "several cases where a mental question, on the part of some one present, has been answered in writing, either with a planchette or a simple pencil, without any consciousness of either the question or the answer on the part of the person whose hand was automatically acting." Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research, December, 1884.—Tr.

exceeding the probable figure about two to three-fold. (Revue Phil., 1884. No. 12, p. 639, et seq.)*

Yet more surprising are the results if recourse be had to the table, for rapping, or to the psychograph, requiring, it is true, longer practice than the divining rod. Involuntary writing with the hand leaves too much room for interchange with voluntary writing and for the suspicion of intentional deception, for it to be suitable for demonstrative experiments; but in the writing at a distance of mediums, excluding the change into voluntary writing, there is the purest possible experimental material, which then, as indubitable expression of the masked somnambulant consciousness, affords also, in fact, the most astonishing proofs of thought-reading. If, for instance, questions are written in a closeable slate, on the second inner side of which the medium then writes at a distance the answers (Ps. St. IV. 388; XI. 497),† no explanation more readily suggests itself than that the somnambulant consciousness of the medium perceives the question from the thought of the person writing it down, and thereupon imparts the answer.

Thought-reading is yet more involved and removed from detection, in that not only thoughts of the waking consciousness, but even those of the masked somnambulant consciousness of the persons present, can make entry into the somnambulant consciousness of the medium. This could only be completely proved by experimenting with two mediums, one to guess the answers which the other had made to questions without previous knowledge by the waking consciousness. But it can also be inferred with approximate certainty from the fact that somnambules frequently give information concerning the past of the questioner, contradicting the present recollections of his waking consciousness, that the statement is nevertheless persisted in, and that either his memory, sharpened by more circumstantial additions, at once recognises his own error, or being subsequently accidentally led into the right track confirms the somnambule's assertion.‡ Such cases are usually treated as clairvoyance, but it seems more probable that there is a masked somnambulant memory in the questioner, which, excited by the question, by means of its hyperæsthesia realises truer recollections than the duller memory of waking consciousness. Further, someone present, whose interest is excited in a particular direction, may have in his masked somnambulant consciousness recollections of formerly heard or seen sentences in foreign languages; these impressions may, by the medium, be divined by thought-reading and be involuntarily written (or rapped out), without the waking consciousness of the other recognising the result thus presented to him as his own recollections.§

As these instances are not numerous, and as on the other hand there are a not inconsiderable percentage of persons, in whom the masked somnambulant consciousness lying below the threshold has a certain vivacity, nothing is opposed to the presumption that the phenomenon in question only occurs in somnambules in connection with such persons having masked somnambulant consciousness.

Given the case of the somnambulant and waking consciousnesses of the questioner presenting their respective impressions of different characters to the somnambule, according to the foregoing it is not surprising that the more hallucinatory impression of the somnambulant consciousness is easier perceived than the more abstract thoughts of the waking consciousness, so that under these suppositions the phenomenon also is explained without clairvoyance.

Slade, for example, saw the figures which were on the three coins contained in the plastered-up boxes, and Zöllner finds in that an instance of true clairvoyance, because he had put the coins in the boxes a long time previously, and no longer exactly remembered of what description they were.* Just in this case it seems to me doubtless, though subsequent confirmation by correction of Zöllner's memory is wanting, that there was here no clairvoyance, but thought-reading of somnambulant impressions. For that Zöllner was a masked somnambule, who, without knowing it, co-operated with Slade, is highly probable from the whole character of the phenomena manifested in those sittings, and just as probable is it that Zöllner, in putting up the coins, had accurately observed them. These two suppositions suffice, however, for the data, first, that Zöllner's somnambulant memory had taken in the numbers of the coins, and secondly, that with the tension of mental occupation with the object, the hyperæsthetic somnambulant memory realised these numbers, while the memory of the waking consciousness endeavoured in vain to recall even the descriptions of the coins. Under such circumstances, Slade's somnambulant consciousness could perceive the numbers by thought-transference, and all that is striking in the case is that this perception was so lively as to pass as visionary sight into the waking consciousness and into expression there; unless the opinion is preferred, that at that moment Slade's waking consciousness had sunk below the threshold, and the somnambulant had possessed itself of the organs of speech. Slade being also a speaking medium, there is nothing to prevent the adoption of the latter view.

A medium has always a lively interest in divining the open or masked thoughts of those present; for it is his interest to eluce astonishing manifestations, and nothing can be more astonishing for "sound common-sense" ("gesunden Menschen verstand") than exhibitions of a knowledge which the persons present believe to be confined exclusively to themselves, or which is even withdrawn from their own waking consciousness. The will to perceive must therefore be supposed continually present in the medium. But if the others, on their side likewise, have a lively interest in the occurrence of striking phenomena, that must develop in them the will to support the medium according to their own powers, and to lighten his difficulties. And then the unconscious will is excited to thought-transference. Moreover in circles the hands are in contact, so that all conditions are as favourable as possible for thought-transference. And when the other person is a masked somnambule like Zöllner, it is scarcely still surprising that results at such sittings should exceed the average.

For experiments in intentional thought-transference, there can be no subjects better adapted than mediums with the faculty of writing at a distance, only there must be an end to misusing the medium's nerve force by the childish game of oracular questioning, and systematic experimentation must take its place. These trials must at first relate to impressions of single senses, and gradually rise to more abstract representations; the distance of the transferor from the medium must also be gradually increased, and the percentage of successes as depending on distance be ascertained. For the effects at greater (mile-wide) distances, a second medium must be introduced, and the influence of distance, if any, and of what kind, must be determined. Hitherto spiritistic sittings afford no material for thought-transference at great distance, the medium having always been the only active party, instead of being reduced, as in such experiments is necessary, to a passive relation to another medium at a distant place.

SOME ODD "FADS" AND FANCIES; THEIR RATIONALE AND EXPLANATION.

BY S. EADON, M.D.

VI.

Whence comes this unseen, supernatural power? Can it be aught else than a disembodied spirit, of a high order, working upon and influencing the spirit and physical organisation of man, whilst yet in an embodied form, producing effects which human beings not so impressed from spirit-life are unable to produce? Genius is but another name for spirit-aid from a higher life. Poets in all ages, and men "of high-born genius" in every department of science and of literature have ever felt these inspirational influences from another life, and never forgot to invoke their aid in any "adventurous flight," as, when Milton says:—

"And chiefly thou, O spirit, that dost prefer
Before all temples the upright heart and pure,
Instruct me; for thou knowest
What in me is dark Illuminate."

Again, he says, that his "Heroic Song" was due to

"My celestial patroness, who deigns
Her mighty visitation, unimplored,
And dictates to me slumbering, or inspires,
Easy, my unpremeditated verse."

Who aided the soul of Shakespeare to roam at will through boundless and untrodden paths of thought, and to write, as no man ever did before, or, perhaps, ever will again? Who? but, as Coleridge says:—

"Contemplant spirits! Ye that hover over
With untired gaze the immeasurable fount
Ebullient with creative Deity!
And ye of plastic power that interfused
Both through the grossest and material mass
In organising surge."

Who inspired the spirit of Newton, from the mere incident of the fall of an apple, to open up the mechanism of the heavens, and demonstrate laws which govern stellar systems, invisible save by telescopic and Nebule vision? Who? but some mightier Newton from spirit life? As it ever has been, so it will ever be, as man becomes fitter for higher kinds of knowledge, disembodied spirits will select embodied forms of analogous order, as mediums, whereby to open up higher forms of thought, and point out the means whereby discoveries may be made preëminent with social and national advancement, and which will tend to raise, in due time, the whole family of man to higher kinds of civilisation not yet dreamed of. The spirit world is about us; and

"Millions of spiritual beings walk the air
Both when we wake and when we sleep."

And the great want of the age is a universal kind of mediumship whereby disembodied spirits can hold high intercourse with spirits

"Whilst yet in their muddy vesture of decay."

The signs of this interchange are at hand; and soon will be manifest, that the unseen and the seen are, in reality, but

"One realm,
One continent of easy thoroughfare."

And the earth, in these fast-coming times, will

"Be but the shadow of heaven, and Kings therein, Each to other like, more than thought."

Great changes yet await the earth and its inhabitants. A genius is, in reality, a medium between the invisible and the visible, making known a higher form of thought, a now and a then,

"Down the corridors of time,
For man's advancement."

The time will come when millions of men will be thus endowed, and knowledge, of a kind unknown at present, will cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. In those days, mankind—having cast aside the creeds, the forms, the devices, and the uncertain theologies of men—will, with one accord, and with singleness of heart and purity of purpose, worship the Great and Supreme Intelligence beneath the starry dome of millions of suns and systems, mingling their songs with the music of the spheres, in one grand harmonious chorus—

"For ever singing, as they shine,
'The hand that makes us is Divine.'"

A German mineralogist, by means of the divining rod, discovered many very valuable mines, thus proving its use in a practical and commercial sense. Nor has it been without advantage in furthering the ends of justice. A man and his wife, for the sake of their money, had been murdered in a cellar. A man named Jacques Aymar, a wealthy peasant, and a sensitive, was taken to this spot. Guided by the rod, he followed the track of the murderers into hotels; told the glasses from which they had drunk; tracked them by land and over rivers; recognised the beds upon which they had slept, the very pots they had touched, till he was conducted, by this hazel fork, to the gates of a prison, where he felt sure one or more of the wretches would be found. Four male prisoners were placed before him, when the rod turned violently towards a man with a hump-back, who had been admitted, only half-an-hour before, for some petty larceny. The peasant said the man with the hump was one of the assassins. The fellow at first denied it, but at length confessed; and he corroborated, in every particular, the truth of the track taken by the sensitive over forty-five French leagues. This case is remarkable, and is well authenticated. From these examples, it is highly probable when veins of metal break, and geologists and mineralogists are at a loss to point out the corresponding seam, if a sensitive were called in, he might be able to indicate where the broken vein begins. In these cases, sensitives, cataleptics, lunatics of a certain order, and somnambulists may, some time, be quite in request for commercial purposes; and instead of being a burden, might really prove benefactors to their several localities, doing, in fact, what science had failed to accomplish. The discovery of OD, seems quite adequate to explain the phenomena of which the hazel-fork is the outward symbol. It is something more than a mere sort of hocus-pocus, or legerdemain, to satisfy the vulgar mind, which is never contented unless a veritable something impinges upon the senses, and seems adequate, in their eyes, to account for the effects observed. The opinion of Dr. Herbert Mayo, Tardy de Montrivel, Ritter, Thouvenel and others, is "that there is strong evidence to show that, in competent and honest hands, the divining rod really does what is pretended of it"; i.e., in the hands of sensitives whose Odic force seems naturally to have some kind of occult relationship with lodes of metals, seams of coal, and the flowing of subterranean water.

(To be continued.)

A MATERIALISATION SEANCE with the medium Mott, Kansas City, is reported by T. J. Haughey, in the Spiritual Offering. After detailing the constitution of the circle, &c., he relates the appearance at the window of the cabinet of General Bledsoe, and the particulars of the conversation between the General and himself; then of his old well-remembered captain in the War of Secession; then of his mother, in her well-remembered head covering. He concludes: "Each of the eight sitters got some revelation that seemed to be good to them. The recognised father and brother of one lady were seen by us all. She was very agitated. Her father bade her be brave, and said if she could conquer her nervousness, he would be able to appear in full form outside the cabinet. We each paid a dollar and a-half. We parted with Mr. and Mrs. Mott, feeling thankful that nature is so kind to give to every soul a conscious immortality, and that she has not arbitrarily arranged an eternal separation. I inwardly bless human nature, and take courage to prosecute my earthly journey. I must express regret that all have not an opportunity to visit this medium and witness for themselves this divine phenomenon."

WHAT CONJURERS SAY ABOUT PSYCHICAL PHENOMENA.

Mediums, who are the instruments of an external agency, have, more than once, been confronted with conjurers who deceive by sleight of hand; and in the same manner that no man of science who has thoroughly and fairly investigated the phenomena has failed to become convinced of their reality, so no conjurer who has been confronted with the same facts has been able to explain their occurrence by prestidigitation. Houdin, Jacobs, Bellachini, Hermann, Kellar, and others have already confessed their powerlessness to produce under the same conditions what occurs without human intervention in the presence of a medium.

Testimony of Robert Houdin.

The Marquis Endes de Mirville published during the lifetime of Houdin two letters from the latter, in his "Mémoire adressé à MM. les membres de l'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques, sur un grand nombre de phénomènes merveilleux intéressant également la Religion, la Science, et les hommes du Monde," in which the conjurer confesses his inability to explain the phenomena he witnessed in the presence of Alexis, the clairvoyant. A circumstantial account is given of M. de Mirville's visit to Houdin for the purpose of engaging him in this investigation, of the latter's confidence in his own ability to detect the trick, and of what took place at the séance, the conditions of which were entirely under Houdin's control. This account extends over twelve pages, and its accuracy is confirmed by Houdin in the first of the documents now translated:—

"Although very far from accepting the eulogies which M. — is good enough to bestow upon me, and especially insisting that I am not at all committed to opinions, either in favour of magnetism or against it, I can, nevertheless, not refrain from declaring that the facts above reported are entirely correct (sont de la plus complète exactitude), and that, the more I reflect upon them, the more impossible I find it to rank them among those which belong to my art and profession."

"4th May, 1847. ROBERT HOUDIN."

A fortnight later, M. de Mirville received another letter, in which the following, referring to another séance, occurs:—

"I have, therefore, returned from this séance as astonished as it is possible to be, and persuaded that it is utterly impossible that chance or skill could ever produce effects so wonderful (tout à fait impossible que le hasard ou l'adresse puisse jamais produire des effets aussi merveilleux).—I am, monsieur, &c.,

"May 16th, 1847."

(Signed), ROBERT HOUDIN."

Testimony of Harry Kellar.

Harry Kellar, a distinguished professor of legerdemain, investigated the slate-writing phenomena which occurred in the presence of Mr. Eglinton, at Calcutta, in January, 1882, and on the 25th of that month he addressed a letter to the editor of the Indian Daily News, in which he said:—

"In your issue of the 13th January I stated that I should be glad of an opportunity of participating in a séance with a view of giving an unbiased opinion as to whether, in my capacity of a professional prestidigitator, I could give a natural explanation of effects said to be produced by spiritual aid."

"I am indebted to the courtesy of Mr. Eglinton, the Spiritualistic medium now in Calcutta, and of his host, Mr. J. Meugens, for affording me the opportunity I craved."

"It is needless to say I went as a sceptic, but I must own that I have come away utterly unable to explain, by any natural means, the phenomena that I witnessed on Tuesday evening. I will give a brief description of what took place."

After describing several successful experiments, Mr. Kellar proceeds:—

"In respect to the above manifestations, I can only say that I do not expect my account of them to gain general credence. Forty-eight hours before I should not have believed anyone who described such manifestations under similar circumstances. I still remain a sceptic as regards Spiritualism, but I repeat my inability to explain or account for what must have been an intelligent force that produced the writing on the slate, which, if my senses are to be relied on, was in no way the result of trickery or sleight of hand."

On the 30th of the same month Mr. Kellar addressed another letter to the Indian Daily News, reporting some experiences of another kind with Mr. Eglinton, and regarding which he said:—

"In conclusion, let me state that after a most stringent trial and strict scrutiny of these wonderful experiences I can arrive at no other conclusion than that there was no trace of trickery in any form; nor was there in the room any mechanism or machinery by which could be produced the phenomena which had taken place. The ordinary mode by which Muscelyne and other conjurers imitate levitation or the floating test could not possibly be done in the room in which we were assembled."

The Testimony of Professor Jacobs.

Professor Jacobs, writing to the editor of Licht, nach Licht, April 10th, 1881, in reference to phenomena which occurred in Paris through the Brothers Davenport, said:—

"Spite of the assertions, more or less trustworthy, of the French and English journalists, and spite of the foolish jealousies of ignorant conjurers, I feel it my duty to show up the bad faith of one party and the chicanery of the other. All that has been said or done adverse to these American mediums is absolutely trustworthy. If we would rightly judge of a thing we must understand it, and neither the journalists nor the conjurers possessed the most elementary knowledge of the science that governs these phenomena. As a prestidigitator of repute, and a sincere Spiritualist, I affirm that the medianistic facts demonstrated by the two brothers were absolutely true, and belonged to the Spiritualistic order of things in every respect."

"Messrs. Robin and Robert Houdin, when attempting to imitate these said facts, never presented to the public anything beyond an infantine and almost grotesque parody of the said phenomena, and it would be only ignorant and obstinate persons who could regard the questions seriously as set forth by these gentlemen. If (as I have every reason to hope) the psychical studies, to which I am applying myself at this time, succeed, I shall be able to establish clearly, and that by public demonstration, the immense line of demarcation which separates medianistic phenomena from conjuring proper, and then equivocation will be no longer possible, and persons will have to yield to evidence, or deny through predetermination to deny."

"Following the data of the learned chemist and natural philosopher, Mr. W. Crookes, of London, I am now in a position to prove plainly, and by purely scientific methods, the existence of a 'psychic force' in mesmerism, and also the individuality of the spirit in 'spiritual manifestation.' I authorise you, dear sir, to insert this letter in your next number, if agreeable to you, &c., &c."

Testimony of Samuel Bellachini.

Samuel Bellachini, Court Conjurer at Berlin, made the following declaration in December, 1877:—

"I hereby declare it to be a rash action to give decisive judgment upon the objective medial performance of the American medium, Mr. Henry Slade, after only one sitting and the observations so made. After I had, at the wish of several highly esteemed gentlemen of rank and position, and also for my own interest, tested the physical mediumship of Mr. Slade, in a series of sittings by full daylight, as well as in the evening in his bedroom, I must, for the sake of truth, hereby certify that the phenomenal occurrences with Mr. Slade have been thoroughly examined by me with the minutest observation and investigation of his surroundings, including the table, and that I have not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitative manifestations, or by mechanical apparatus; and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation is absolutely impossible. It must rest with such men of science as Crookes and Wallace, in London; Perty, in Bern; Butlerof, in St. Petersburg, to search for the explanation of this phenomenal power, and to prove its reality. I declare, moreover, the published opinions of laymen as to the 'How' of this subject to be premature, and, according to my view and experience, false and one-sided. This, my declaration, is signed and executed before a notary and witnesses."

"Berlin, December 6th, 1877."

(Signed) SAMUEL BELLACHINI."

ADVICE TO INQUIRERS.

The Conduct of Circles.—By "M.A. (Oxon.)."

If you wish to see whether Spiritualism is really only jugglery and imposture, try it by personal experiment.

If you can get an introduction to some experienced Spiritualist, on whose good faith you can rely, ask him for advice; and, if he is holding private circles, seek permission to attend one to see how to conduct séances, and what to expect.

There is, however, difficulty in obtaining access to private circles, and, in any case, you must rely chiefly on experiences in your own family circle, or amongst your own friends, all strangers being excluded. The bulk of Spiritualists have gained conviction thus.

Form a circle of from four to eight persons, half, or at least two, of negative, passive temperament, and preferably of the female sex, the rest of a more positive type.

Sit, positive and negative alternately, secure against disturbance, in subdued light, and in comfortable and unconstrained positions, round an uncovered table of convenient size. Place the palms of the hands flat upon its upper surface. The hands of each sitter need not touch those of his neighbour, though the practice is frequently adopted.

Do not concentrate attention too fixedly on the expected manifestations. Engage in cheerful but not frivolous conversation. Avoid dispute or argument. Scepticism has no deterrent effect, but a bitter spirit of opposition in a person of determined will may totally stop or decidedly impede manifestations. If conversation flags, music is a great help, if it be agreeable to all, and not of a kind to irritate the sensitive ear. Patience is essential, and it may be necessary to meet ten or twelve times, at short intervals, before anything occurs. If after such a trial you still fail, form a fresh circle. Guess at the reason of your failure, eliminate the inharmonious elements, and introduce others. An hour should be the limit of an unsuccessful séance.

The first indications of success usually are a cold breeze passing over the hands, with involuntary twitchings of the hands and arms of some of the sitters, and a sensation of throbbing in the table. These indications, at first so slight as to cause doubt as to their reality, will usually develop with more or less rapidity.

If the table moves, let your pressure be so gentle on its surface that you are sure you are not aiding its motions. After some time you will probably find that the movement will continue if your hands are held over, but not in contact with, it. Do not, however, try this until the movement is assured, and be in no hurry to get messages.

When you think that the time has come, let some one take command of the circle and act as spokesman. Explain to the unseen Intelligence that an agreed code of signals is desirable, and ask that a tilt may be given as the alphabet is slowly repeated at the several letters which form the word that the Intelligence wishes to spell. It is convenient to use a single tilt for No, three for Yes, and two to express doubt or uncertainty.

When a satisfactory communication has been established, ask if you are rightly placed, and if not, what order you should take. After this, ask who the Intelligence purports to be, which of the company is the medium, and such relevant questions. If confusion occurs, ascribe it to the difficulty that exists in directing the movements at first with exactitude. Patience will remedy this, if there be a real desire on the part of the Intelligence to speak with you. If you only satisfy yourself at first that it is possible to speak with an Intelligence separate from that of any person present, you will have gained much.

The signals may take the form of raps. If so, use the same code of signals, and ask as the raps become clear that they may be made on the table, or in a part of the room where they are demonstrably not produced by any natural means, but avoid any vexatious imposition of restrictions on free communication. Let the Intelligence use its own means; if the attempt to communicate deserves your attention, it probably has something to say to you, and will resent being hampered by useless interference. It rests greatly with the sitters to make the manifestations elevating or frivolous and even tricky.

Should an attempt be made to entrance the medium, or to manifest by any violent methods, or by means of form manifestations, ask that the attempt may be deferred till you can secure the presence of some experienced Spiritualist. If this request is not heeded, discontinue the sitting. The process of developing a trance-medium is one that might disconcert an inexperienced inquirer. Increased light will check noisy manifestations.

Lastly, try the results you get by the light of Reason. Maintain a level head and a clear judgment. Do not believe everything you are told, for though the great unseen world contains many a wise and discerning spirit, it also has in it the accumulation of human folly, vanity, and error; and this lies nearer to the surface than that which is wise and good. Distrust the free use of great names. Never for a moment abandon the use of your reason. Do not enter into a very solemn investigation in a spirit of idle curiosity or frivolity. Cultivate a reverent desire for what is pure, good and true. You will be repaid if you gain only a well-grounded conviction that there is a life after death, for which a pure and good life before death is the best and wisest preparation.

MISS ELIZABETH STUART PHELPS

AND THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH.

By "M. A. (Oxon.)."

The current number of the North American Review contains an article by Miss E. S. Phelps on "The Great Psychical Opportunity," which she "is tempted to call the Opportunity of the Century." Giving a substantial approval to the principles on which the Society was founded in England, and subsequently in America, Miss Phelps wants to know what is being done. Darwin, we are reminded, "was twenty-two years in collecting and controlling the material for 'The Origin of Species' and 'The Descent of Man.' He had in the highest degree the two things necessary to the discovery of a great principle: the power to attend, and the power to infer. We might add a third, the power to imagine. He observed and recorded as no other man of our day has done: his power of inference proved equal to his observing and recording power;" and as a result we have the doctrine of evolution.

Desiderating the employment of the same patient methods, Miss Phelps recognises, "with a keen sense of their wisdom," the appeal of the officers of the Society for Psychical Research to the public for co-operation in collecting and investigating alleged facts that lie hid in the recesses of human experience. It is "to the help of the unlearned that the learned have appealed." "Do we sneer or smile? If we are wise we shall do neither. These men know what they are about, and why they are about it. . . . The greater the weight the more the strands in the cable that hoists it. Nothing is too small for so huge a work as that which would lift the load of mystery, older than the Witch of Endor, terrified at her trick [where does the "trick" come in, Miss Phelps?] which had summoned what we should now find it fashionable to call a 'telepathic impression'—a load as new as the last poor creature, in fresh mourning, paying two dollars a sitting to a fifth story medium, to get 'communications' from her dead child. He who means to win in a charge on this mountain of mystery and misery can condescend—must condescend to the infinite drudgery of discovery."

There is no objection to be raised against this candid and cautious tone. The work is enormous; surrounded with difficulties; envied with prejudice on every side. The records available are in some cases emotionally related, and of no value as exact narratives. And even those which do relate, with some approach to scientific accuracy, facts that are really important, are not in themselves such as the Society has hitherto deemed most suitable for its purposes. Miss Phelps makes some calculations as to the number of Spiritualists—two millions (she thinks) in America, and more than that number in Great Britain. "Here, let us say, to take the most modest figures, are two millions of our people, intelligent enough to conduct the affairs, and obey the laws, and bear the responsibilities of average civilised society" who testify respecting these facts. "Hundreds of people," she says in another place, "whose word of honour is as good intellectual coin as that of the reader of this page or the contributor to this review, have testified to the conveyance of thought, without visible, or audible, or tangible media, from embodied mind to embodied mind; to the tragic or trivial incidents of mesmerism; to the coincidence of dreams; to the prophecy of mental convictions; to the visual appearance of the distant living; to the sight or sign of what is thought to be the more distant dead." "Say what we may (and we ought to say it) of the nonsense, of the fraud, of the jugglery, the hysteria, the blasphemy mixed to a mush with the whole matter, the significant fact remains that here is a whole class, not of the lowest or most illiterate, while not yet, to any marked extent, of the wisest or highest, who believe themselves, in our highly illuminated times, to have found some means of access to the consciousness of the dead."

Or, perhaps with a passing word of warning not to be hasty in assuming fraud and hysteria too conveniently, it would be better to say that there is a compact mass of people, quite as capable of judging evidence as their critics, with level heads and clear minds, and with a block of experience to reason from to which these critics can make no pretence, who believe that the so-called dead have systematically communicated with them. To this it may pertinently be added that this compact body of thinking and reasoning people is not troubled with deserters from its ranks, but is constantly receiving accession from those who have examined for themselves, and find the Spiritualistic hypothesis the only one which covers the facts, in spite of the opposition with which science meets it, and, I may say, in spite of the tentative and often puerile efforts which some notable scientific folk have made from time to time to explain, or to explain away, that which they have not first taken the pains to understand.*

I agree with Miss Phelps in her desire for Darwinian patience, as I also do when she defines the scientific basis of thought and action as requiring two paramount qualifications—"equipment and candour: the presence of equivalent ability and the absence of nullifying prejudice." We Spiritualists have had too much reason to complain that adequate intellectual equipment in our critics has not always co-existed with adequate patience in the study of our facts; nor have these qualifications been always illuminated by that candour and impartiality which springs most of all from the "absence of nullifying prejudice." Perfect candour is a rare gift. "The bigotry of the laboratory and the library is quite as robust as the bigotry of the altar and the creed. . . . We hear a great deal about the value of scientific evidence. We have a right to ask a great deal from the scientific attitude."

* Vide Dr. W. B. Carpenter (passim), Prof. Lankester, Prof. Tyndall, and other leaders of scientific opinion, for instances of hasty, inaccurate, and insufficient generalisation.

What should it be? That which George Eliot would call one of 'massive receptiveness.' What must it be? That which will stand the test of its own primer and grammar. . . . An imperceptible jar of human prejudice may spoil the finest web of attention and inference that ever the human mind has wrought. . . . What is it, indeed, to be candid but to be willing to see a thing turn out either way? What is the scientific spirit but the honest spirit? What is it to be wise, but to be just?"

That seems to me to be a much-needed protest on behalf of an elementary qualification for dealing with these mysteries, which may be commended alike to the high priests of exact science, to the Psychical Researchers, and to the Spiritualists, which latter body, having what they confidently believe to be truth on their side, can, while recommending candour to their critics, afford to exercise themselves that measure of the same virtue which consists in being "willing to see a thing turn out either way." We have nothing to fear from candid, impartial, and exhaustive investigation; nor, indeed, from inadequate theorising for which the time has not yet come.

"It is not time yet" (says Miss Phelps) "for any 'working hypothesis.' It is too early to have assurances that one thing can, or another cannot be. We shall never have the truth by inventing it, but by discovering it. . . . I say, without hesitation, that no investigator is qualified to pass judgment on psychical phenomena who is not equally ready to admit—if admit he must—in the end that he is dealing with the physiological action of cells in the frontal lobes of the brain, or with the presence of a human soul disembodied by death."

Gradually Miss Phelps comes to apply her general statements to a critical examination of the methods of the English Society for Psychical Research. The passage formulates what, it must be admitted, is in the mouths of men expressed even more impatiently.

"In the work of the English Society, a close observer may already detect the danger of a mistake in the precise direction where the Society most deprecates mistakes in its coadjutors. It seems to us that a hypothesis is put to very hard play, if not to work, in the hands of the committees most interested in the telepathic theory. . . . Suppose that the telepathic theory might explain an immense proportion (I do not say all) of what are called the supernatural facts of Spiritualism; whether it does so we have not yet 'accumulated and reflected' enough to say."

That is temperately put, and true as far as it goes. We cannot say yet how far exactly the hypothesis will reach; but we can say that it does not reach so far as it is sought to stretch it. And, while substantially agreeing, as I do, in the methods of the Society for Psychical Research, it is open to me to say that it seems both illogical and wasteful of effort and of time to persist in applying a hypothesis to facts which it admittedly will not wholly cover. It is not necessary to urge the adoption of the Spiritualistic hypothesis, though it claims by right a hospitable reception; but it is open to us to point out that it is no new thing in the world, that it does cover all the ground, and that it should not be evaded through antagonistic prepossession, an attitude which I am thankful to find that some of the leaders of action in the Society for Psychical Research categorically disavow. Such distinct disavowal as Mr. F. W. H. Myers, for instance, has more than once given in most unequivocal terms must be accepted ex animo if any friendly or courteous controversy is to be maintained. I fear, however, from a perusal of the open letter of Mr. Farmer in last week's "LIGHT," that there is in some quarters, which I do not seek to define, a feeling which Spiritualists, as a matter of ordinary self-respect, must resent and disavow as unworthy and even insulting.

It will be very necessary to clear the air of these thunder-clouds before any candid and impartial investigation of subjects about which Spiritualists certainly know more than most people, can be hoped for. I have not discerned for myself all that antagonism to Spiritualism which I know many believe to exist on the part of the chief leaders of thought and action in the Society for Psychical Research. I have had much sympathy with the course of action pursued, though I have thought it slow sometimes. I have, indeed, regretted that facts lying at our thresholds should seem to be neglected, while the Society went far afield only to return empty. I have seen difficulties in the way of investigating Spiritualistic phenomena by committees; and also of the sifting of evidence in the way that the Society has hitherto employed. I was quite content to wait; but I am compelled to say, with pain and deep regret, that this unfortunate letter of Mr. Farmer's correspondent, with its most unfortunate language, comes just at a time when it will give colour in the minds of susceptible people to an idea which it is to the last degree desirable to avoid.

"PSYCHICAL RESEARCH."

The method of investigation pursued by the leaders of the Society for Psychical Research has before now called forth strong protests from Spiritualists and others, both outside the Society and within it, but it is pretty evident that the charges which have been brought against it cannot be ignored much longer, and that they will have to be met and answered fairly. The most recent adverse criticism from a member of the Society is that of Mr. G. D. Haughton, which appears in the August number of the Journal, and to which additional interest will attach through the strikingly inadequate reply of Mr. Frederic W. H. Myers.

No one will deny that the Society has done some very useful and important work, and that to some extent it has been clearing the ground. It stands midway between the Spiritualists and the outer world, or profanum vulgus. It is able, no doubt, to command a certain amount of attention from men who require, in regard to occult matters, to be treated gently and tenderly, and for whom the phenomena and teachings of Spiritualism proper are what Chemistry or Greek would be to a boor. It has collected a number of facts—most of them, it is true, of secondary value, and has appointed various committees for "investigation," and even for experiment, which, by the way, appear to be chiefly remarkable for the non-presentation of reports—but for all that, the criticisms which have been made are neither uncalled for nor unjust, and no unbiassed person who has studied the Society's Journal and its general method of procedure will be disposed to think that Mr. Haughton exaggerates when he says that the members have become wearied by "negative and abortive results," and that the energy of the Society has been misdirected by the digging up of "shadowy reminiscences of what occurred many years ago," when there are plenty of similar phenomena occurring at the present time to be inquired into.

It would probably not be inapt to compare the Society's method of study and of collecting facts to those adopted by the older and less scientific of the Alchemists, though the word "method" is, perhaps, hardly an appropriate one, for there is but little, if any, method in either case worthy of the name "scientific." The most serious and dangerous error of which those who are responsible for the Society's guidance have been guilty, is the invention of theories. Theorising from insufficient data is the curse of every science. The making of a certain class of theories is far more easy than the making of experiments and the planning of investigations, and the theory-maker accordingly crops up in every direction. He finds, or it may be invents, a big word or phrase wherewith to label his theory, and in nine cases out of ten becomes so firmly wedded to it that he will stretch it to the utmost limits that his mind can give to it, which is saying a good deal; and that he will ignore—generally unconsciously—any facts, however important, which militate against it. To this highly valuable class of hypothetical productions, the Society seems to attach the very greatest importance. "Telepathy" and the "unconscious secondary self" are both before an admiring world, the second, however, being merely a new label for Dr. Carpenter's threadbare "unconscious cerebration" theory, with which that great man for ever settled all the phenomena of Spiritualism.

It must be admitted that it is in the highest degree unscientific to start a theory based upon a few out of a certain body of analogous facts, to refuse to look at the others which might altogether subvert the theory, and to proceed as if they had no existence. There is a distinct petitio principii in the manner in which the word telepathy has been used in the endeavour to account for such phenomena as the "death wraith," as well as in many other instances; and as to the "unconscious secondary self" it is pretty generally known that that most monstrous hypothesis was revived and republished in the face of large numbers of phenomena in themselves sufficient to render the theory untenable, and alleged by the most competent of witnesses to be true. Did the resuscitators of "unconscious cerebration" pause and proceed to investigate these phenomena, which, it was admitted, if they existed, were sufficient to modify or overthrow their theory? Not at all. The theory was published straight away, to remain and act as a stumbling block to future investigation and study, a proceeding which cannot but be considered as other than grossly unscientific.

As pointed out by Mr. Haughton, Messrs. Gurney, Myers, and their friends are vainly endeavouring to propitiate the Scientific Ogre. They have determined to be very "scientific" indeed, and have succeeded wonderfully in being the reverse. They are, perhaps, afraid of being "investigated" by Mr. Lankester, according to the superior methods so elegantly advocated and practised by him; and they tremble at the name of the Royal Society, which is really a very harmless body after all. Mr. Myers shelters himself behind one of the Psychical Society's famous committees, which ought to have "reported" but has not done so. He has not entered into the Barkas case because the inaccuracy or absurdity of some of the replies "seemed to him to preclude the likelihood of a scientific spirit from guiding the medium." In other words, Mr. Myers thinks it easy to lay down the law about the conditions attending such phenomena as these; they are all clear and simple to him; but he says nothing about those replies which were accurate and not absurd, and entirely outside and beyond the knowledge of those present, except that they were "interesting." We can expect no more since no theory with a high sounding name is yet ready to come out of the Society's forcing-room. Because a certain medium is supposed to have been guilty of fraud upon some occasion, Mr. Myers decides to have nothing to do with her or the phenomena that may occur in her presence. We know the value and the meaning of many of these so-called detections. Mr. Myers clearly does not. It would be well to know whether the evidence of this medium's alleged fraud has been subjected to that careful and rigid scientific and legal scrutiny for which the Psychical Society is so pre-eminently distinguished; but whether it has or has not, it would appear from Mr. Myers' statement that he considers himself incapable of distinguishing between fraudulent and genuine manifestations, of guarding against the former and of appreciating the latter, and that therefore he cannot very well rank as a "first-class witness."

The real mot d'ordre of the Psychical Society may be summed up in the well-known phrase, "Spirit is the last thing I will give in to," a position which involves some of the most wanton assumptions possible. There is the monstrous assumption that in view of the "well-known laws of Nature" the spirit hypothesis is the most difficult to accept; whereas, if the matter is to be argued from a priori grounds, it will be found somewhat more rational to accept the spirit hypothesis than, for example, the hypothesis of the "unconscious secondary self." Again, there is the assumption that Science is opposed to Spiritualism. True Science is not opposed to Spiritualism—far from it; it unquestionably tends in that direction. The whole Scientific world may be safely defied to prove—with the wretchedly small glimmering that we possess of a few fragments of some few of Nature's laws—that the teaching of modern Science is anti-Spiritual. None of the really great and true among men of science have ever finally thought so. It is but a few camp followers who have raised the cry, and who at the utmost have believed that they believed in it.

"Let us have facts first and theories afterwards," says Mr. Haughton. Let us hope that the leaders of "Psychical Research" will see the force of this. "Les faits restent et les théories passent." And let us also hope that when at length these gentlemen descend from the pinnacles where they fondly believe themselves to be enthroned, and do us the honour of seriously investigating the present phenomena of Spiritualism, they may be imbued with the true scientific spirit, not with a grotesque imitation of it, and with that single-mindedness, absence of bias, and humility which are the first necessities for the man who would seek and know the truth.

THYMOL.

To be happy in old age it is necessary that we accustom ourselves to objects that can accompany the mind all the way through life, and that we take other things as good in their day. The mere man of pleasure is miserable in old age; and the mere drudge in business is but little better; whereas natural philosophy, mathematical and mechanical science, offer a continual source of tranquil pleasure, the study of which, in spite of gloomy ecclesiastical dogmas, is the study of true theology. It teaches man to know and admire the Creator; for the principles of science are in creation, are unchangeable, and are of Divine origin.—PAINE.

MENTAL TELEGRAPHY.—Those who have lived in Asiatic countries, know that the natives can convey intelligence to each other with more than ordinary rapidity. This was done throughout the great Indian Mutiny, when the "Secret Mail" was known to long forestall the most rapidly-conveyed Government despatches. But the investigations of the London Society for Psychical Research and the New York Academy of Anthropology have well-nigh satisfied us that the Indian natives are in possession of a system of mental telepathy, or telegraphy, advanced beyond the stage of mere experiment.—American Psychological Journal.

PSYCHIC THEORY.—The late Dr. Whedon called the departed "dead angeloids." He had a theory that the ramifications of the nervous system formed in themselves a figure corresponding to the visible external configuration of the body, the one being a perfect resemblance of the other; that this nerve-contour, at death, detached itself to become the external of the spirit. Others have advanced the theory of a still finer form underlying this of the delicate nervous organism, imperceptible to mortal sight, the spirit form of the being. It is as difficult, however, to conceive of the survival of any part of the nervous system, as it is of the resurrection of the old and useless body itself.—Golden Gate.

SINGING IN SPIRITUAL CIRCLES.—The members of a circle should sing at dark seances; the spirits sometimes join in the singing, their voices vibrating clearly: if we stop to listen they often stop, as if for want of support. The singing of a circle promotes unity; it prevents the circle from being troubled by the noise of words which disturb concentration of attention. Singing has a magnetically harmonising effect upon circle, medium and spirits. During the operation of materialisation, and in the manifestation of the spirit voice, the singing of the circle is found especially useful. Spirits use the sound waves in their own speaking and singing; and the better the singing of the circle, the better for the spirit's vocal manifestation.—La Lumière.

A DREAM.—The wife of a prominent citizen of Chicago reports: "My husband handed me four new ten-dollar bills one morning, on leaving home for office. I put them in my note-purse. I went out, but made no payment. At night I found only three notes in my purse. I went to sleep thinking of my loss. In the morning I awoke with a dream of my talking with a lady in a store, and that on my turning to leave she called my attention to my note-purse, hanging at my wrist, being unfastened. I had folded the notes separately and loosely, and they had caused the purse to bulge, but I had thought it safe not to open without pulling. In my dream, I sent a servant to the store to ask if I had dropped the note there, and that he returned with the note. My dream revived in my mind the incident of the lady calling my attention to my open purse, and after breakfast I sent the servant. He brought me my lost bill, with the message that it had been picked up and handed to the cashier, who had put it aside to be claimed."—Spiritual Offering.

DEVELOPMENT OF A MEDIUM.—Louisa House, on recovering from an illness two years ago, had a vision; then she saw clairvoyantly; then she had attacks of unconsciousness for hours; on recovering she related scenes that she had witnessed in what she called "heaven." She was, although in ordinary good health, conscious of the attacks coming on, and would ask not to be disturbed in them; for the family had tried to rouse her to consciousness by rough handling and stimulants. Once, remaining unconscious for eleven hours, the family doctor was sent for, when she sprang to her feet and delivered a religious exhortation. The trance attacks then came on frequently, and spirits, evidently, spoke through her. Neighbours came in; one, a Dane, told me that he was addressed in his own language. Last winter one of these attacks lasted over two days. Fraud, hysteria, insanity, and the devil, were of course on the tips of the neighbours' tongues; but Spiritualists regarded her as under development as a medium. Her father was a materialist, but a deceased brother of his, through her, satisfied him as to his continued existence. Descriptions are now given through her of spirit spheres, corresponding with those through Swedenborg. She has a sister, Phoebe, who is under a similar course of development; but her mediumship seems for tests and drawing in colours. The whole family is esteemed as honest, conscientious, harmonious, and benevolent.—DR. W. JORDAN, in the "Spiritual Offering."

THE BLINDNESS OF SCIENCE.

In Paul Richer's "Etudes Cliniques sur l'Hystère Epilepsie" (Paris, 1881), a work which, for the rest, will well repay the reading of the enlightened Spiritualist, appears a striking example of the utter blindness of science when it is brought face to face with the supernatural. Three reports of cases are given side by side, of which two differ essentially from the third, in exhibiting characteristics perfectly familiar to most readers of our pages, but which have these essential particulars quietly ignored by the learned author.

We will give the three cases, that our readers may behold for themselves this deplorable hiatus in the scientific mind: we quote first the possibly purely pathological case.

"Mademoiselle S., aged forty-six years, believes that all the evils which happen on earth are caused by her. To hear her, she has committed every sin. God has withdrawn Himself from her and delivered her to the devil. This alienation, which manifested itself first merely in melancholy, now manifests itself by songs, recitations, monologues, poured forth with extreme volubility and tones exalted with passion. Mademoiselle feels how absurd all this is, and that it might make her pass for a mad woman, but she obeys an irresistible force which controls her. Nothing on earth can prevent this unlimited expansion, this terrible efflorescence. To these exalted states succeed hysterical crises. She struggles for a long time, violently convulsed. During these attacks the faces of the bystanders, for her, are transformed; she sees hideous phantoms, the devil appears to her, her ideas of possession are much more vivid, she utters piercing cries, praying to be delivered from these apparitions, bursts into laughter, and dissolves in tears. Then at the end of some hours she returns to her habitual state."

Now let the reader compare with this fairly normal case of what is usually, and perhaps rightly considered, in our days at least, solely as disease, the two following:—

"We read in Schurigius that the only daughter of Himpelius, a young modest lady, eighteen years of age, had frequently hysterical attacks. They were very violent, bending her body like a bow, and causing her to utter such loud cries that every one hearing them despaired of her life. However, with the close of the paroxysm, though a little delirious, intellectual capabilities returned to her. She sometimes called for pen, ink, and paper and set to work writing sacred verses and hymns, not without felicity and poetry, such as she would by no means have been able to compose in her usual condition. Sometimes, to the general amazement, she would extemporise a sermon, very eloquent, either in her native tongue or in other languages which before had been unknown to her, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, and which, after the paroxysm, she knew no longer."

"Marguerite B., eleven years of age, of disposition a little violent, but having pious and Christian sentiments, was seized on the 19th of January, 1829, without previous illness, with convulsive attacks, which lasted for a couple of years, with only few, and those short, interruptions. As long as they lasted the child was unconscious, rolling her eyes, making grimaces, putting her arms through all sorts of fantastic movements. On the 21st a voice was heard several times by those around her, which said, 'You are being prayed for.' Immediately she came to herself, weary, exhausted, knowing nothing of what had happened, saying only that she had been dreaming. On the 22nd another low voice, quite distinct from the first, began to be heard also. This voice spoke almost without cessation as long as the crisis lasted (half-an-hour to an hour or more), being occasionally interrupted by the first, which always repeated 'You are being prayed for.' The voice evidently wished to be taken for that of a personality other than the sick girl. It spoke of her sometimes by the third person. It gave to itself an objective source. In all that it said there was no confusion, no incoherence; on the contrary, perfect conscientiousness of ideas, logical method of replying to all questions, even a tone of mockery in rejecting some."

But the distinguishing mark of these discourses was their moral, or rather immoral, tone. They expressed pride, arrogance, millery, hatred against God, Christ, and Truth. "I am the Son of God, the Saviour of the world; bow down and worship Me," were the first words, often repeated, spoken by the voice. Then followed jests on holy things, God, Christ, the Bible, violent indignation against the lovers of goodness, the most fearful curses, boundless fury, a rage altogether indescribable, upon seeing anyone praying, or even clasping the hands. All this might have been considered as pointing to an external influence, if the voice had not of itself betrayed its origin by calling itself devil. As soon as the voice was heard the girl's countenance suddenly changed in the most astounding manner; her aspect became diabolic, so that to conceive it one must read in the Messiah the description of the devil offering Jesus a stone.

On January 26th, at 11 a.m., the very hour, so she said, in which an angel had announced to her that her deliverance would come, all these phenomena ceased. The last thing heard was a voice issuing from her mouth, saying, "Begone, unclean spirit; leave the child. Knowst thou not how dear she is unto me?" She then returned to consciousness.

On January 31st, the same condition reproduced itself with the same symptoms. But gradually new voices were heard, till the patient had six of them, all different in timbre, or a choice of words, or the character of discourse. Each represented the voice of a distinct person, and was announced as such to the patient by the first voice, so often heard. The violence of wrath, the curses, blasphemies, and reproaches of these voices reached the highest pitch in this stage of the disease; and the lucid intervals, in which, by the way, the girl preserved no recollection of what had passed in the paroxysm, but used to read and pray fervently, were shorter and more rare. The 9th of February, which again had been announced to her as the day of her deliverance, put an end to this miserable condition. As before, it was at 11 a.m., after the voice had repeatedly announced its departure, that the following words were heard proceeding from the mouth of the patient: "Begone, unclean spirit; leave the child; thy kingdom is at an end for ever." The girl then came to herself and has since had no relapse. (Kerner, Geschichten, Berenener. Stuttgart, 1834.)

Supposing, then, that our author has taken the trouble to verify his cases, which he has collected, apparently, from independent sources (and we confess that before the prestige of scientific reputation we are too much in awe and trembling even to suggest that he has not), what are we to say, what will twentieth century professors say to his putting these three cases in exactly the same category, and ascribing them all simply to hysteria followed by delirium with hallucinations? Can the force of a blinkered, fatuous, fixed idea further go? Can modest young ladies, by becoming delirious, acquire four languages? Can pious little girls chop logic and swear ad libitum to boot in six voices, by hallucination? We are sceptical.

Alas! M. Richer, your great grandchildren will have to discard the agreeable pages, their ancestral heritage, for others less delectable if they wish to pass the preliminary examinations of the future.

Forty thousand dollars are to be expended on a crematory near Philadelphia. It will be located at Manayunk, within an enclosure of eleven acres.

CHARLES E. WATKINS, the medium for slate-writing, writes H. Martin, invited, some months ago, correspondence with young mediums, to enable his guides to ascertain if they were mediums for slate-writing. I was one to respond. After a few letters I was invited to visit him at the restful home farm, where he is getting up his health after twelve years' work as a public medium. After his amiable wife had retired we had a séance, and his guides encouraged me in my development. I had delightful communications from some of my own spirit friends who promised help. Mr. Watkins proposes, with the aid of wealthy friends, to found in Washington Territory an institution in which suitable mediums may be developed, to meet the need for more mediums to demonstrate the fact of spirit-return, and for imparting the philosophy of Spiritualism. In the meantime he continues his work of helping to develop mediums for the slate-writing. He showed me a large basket filled with letters received by him in answer to his call for correspondence.—H. EUGENE MARTIN, DIMONDALE, MICH., in Spiritual Offering.
